nothing would conclude that all was well and return to his bed. At dawn James Moriarty got a glimpse of the opposite side and shouted the alarm. The river had shifted; the entire beach was torn away by the flood, the dories pilled of the above the other as the state of the shows the sho olled one above the other as they umbeld from the top of the foundering wallowed from side to side with the pressure of the rushing waters. With the aid of a life line across the river on which a dory was swung from side to side we managed to cross the river. Only four men could cross at a time swayed and dipped in a dangerous manner. Thomas Bennett's dory was missing having gone out to sea. It was blowing hard off shore and six men were required to go after the missing dory. Four lay in the bottom while two manned the oars and the launch was safely made. They found the missing boat about two miles off with two planks stove in and all the gear gone. A breaking sea gave them an exciting ride in landing but they escaped capsizing narrowly and came through without mishap.

Many hours elapsed before the sixteen dories in the river could be ex-tricated from their precarous position. Held by their painters and squeezed Held by their painters and squeezed tightly together by the pressure of water over them, it was almost impossible to get a move out of them. At last men with life-lines on them were let down and managed to break them out one by one while they stood on the others; in this way, at imminent risk of life, the work went on until half the dories had been safely broken away and landed, when suddenly one of the painters parted and enly one of the painters parted and he whole mass—men, dories and out-t, started down stream at an appalhit, started down stream deling rate.

How the men escaped being crushed between the rearing dories is a mystery. Those on the bank held the lines and swung them in clear; Terence Hayward having his foot wrenched a bit, being the only one to receive injury. Two of the dories fetched up on the opposite side of the river, four injury. Two of the dories fetched up on the opposite side of the river, four or five others went out through and were later picked up. All were badly broken up, but with the aid of canvas and tin cans have been repaired temporarily to finish the voyage. Martin Power fell into the sea while trying to save his dory. He had a close shave
