fall Nina Leicester lay upon a sick bed. She had no fever-she had no disease of any kind ; so the physicians who attend ed said, but she lay like one stricken with death. Her vital forces seemed to have been paralyzed-some great mental shock had council it, they said, and time, the great healer, would alone show whether she would recover or not.

Her lips were sealed on the subject of the strange drama, which had ended so disastronaly to all her hopes. She would give no explanation of Lord Malcolm's strange disappearance, nor of her own sufferings, nor listen to any conversation whatever, upon the subject. To her mother, who begged and pleast-ed to know the secret of her desertion and wretchedness, she simply said : "He has gone-he believes me utterly false to my vows. I can tell you nothing more," and no arguments could extert snything more from her. Kenneth had disappeared, leaving ne clew as to his future movements and in tentions, excepting a note telling the Earl of Durward that he intended traveling for an indefinite period, and would write him further in the future.

Caroline also was stretched upon a sick bed, stricken with brain fever in its worst form, brought on by "over study and excitement," was the wise conclusion of a prolonged medical consultation. But the poor girl's parents knew that her brain was turned by the despair of a hopeless love, and their wrath waxed hotter and stronger every day against the innocent cause of her suffering.

She babbled day and night of being so happy, wedding guests were always happy, ing with pain at the insult. of flowers made from heart's blood to deck wedding robes, of a vine arbor, haunted by some strange spirits, and a thousand other weird fancies which tantalized her attendants with their mystery, but gave no clew to anything.
