Editor Review :

The question : Shall I be a specialist, and breed one variety only ? is an important one, and one that demands the attention of not only the beginner but also of the more experienced fancier. Of course the real question at issue is : Which course will lead to the greatest measure of success ?

First let us inquire what constitutes success in this peculiar industry. To be not only the owners but also the producers of a very superior class of stock, is doubtless the first essential element in becoming a successful breeder. And with many this constitutes the full measure of success ; but with the majority this is only a means to an end. That is, success with them is to be counted in dollars and cents. And this is the largest class. Then it becomes apparent that a reputation is to be built up, which can only be done by exhibiting and supplying the trade with a superior article at the lowest rates from year to year. Thus it is seen that poultry breeding, for profit, more closely resembles a profession than an ordinary commercial undertaking, in its manner of securing success. Therefore let not that man think, who has purchased a few fine fowls and won a number of prizes with them, and it may be upon their direct progeny, that he has achieved success, or established a permanent reputation ; nor should any beginner deceive himself with such delusive conclusions, for sooner or later he has to come down to the hard pan of his own knowledge of the art of breeding ; and though his fine birds may for a year or two breed good stock without any artificial interference, yet we are assured that this state of things will not long continue.

The following is Mr. Felch's definition of a successful breeder : " We should feel that as long as we deliver into other hands these strains as we received them, we have been equal to the task of breeding them, and should be considered breeders." And until we have proved that we have acquired this ability we have not established a reputation.

Now, it is apparent that the beginner, like the Doctor or Lawyer, must earn this reputation by degrees. Let us examine the road to success a little more closely, so that we may come to an intelligent conclusion as to the safest and most direct route to the desired goal. Now, my beginning friend, the first caution I shall give you in your setting out is : Don't assume too much in making your calculations and arrangements, and another is, be prepared for disappointment. Success will come, but do not forget that it is always at the cost of perseverance and energy, associated with intelligence. If you clear expenses for the first few years, while you are a student or an apprentice, you need not complain.

The majority of beginners get annihilated just here. They commence with
