

institution. While most held the view that the U.N. and other similar organizations could do little to resolve really large problems, that on those which they saw as secondary issues (i.e., resource management, environmental protection, and programming) significant results were being achieved.