THE PEACEFUL SETTLEMENT OF DISPUTES

Text of Statement to be delivered in the Special Political Committee by the Canadian Representative, Mr. Pierre-E. Trudeau, M.P., Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister, on Item 36 (The Peaceful Settlement of Disputes), on December 16, 1966.

I do not intend to repeat the reasons my Delegation gave at the last Session why we believe this subject to be vitally important. We understand, even if we do not approve, the reasons for the interruption of our discussion a year ago. We welcome resumption of the debate and hope that those who did not participate last year may do so this year.

Three principal objections were made at the 20th Session to the adoption of a resolution on this subject. The first was that not enough time had been given for delegations to consider the matter and, as it was not urgent, it could be left over until the following session. I assume that we can all agree that this objection no longer applies. We have all had a year to examine the implications of the proposal that a careful study be made of the subject.

Secondly, it was said that the resolution did not take account of the nature of certain types of disputes in Africa and that it somehow reflected unfavourably on the principle of self-determination. My delegation believes that this charge is unjustified. None of the co-sponsors has any other purpose than to study this subject as objectively as possible and to try to arrive at conclusions which might be helpful to all member states. No one can deny that if disputes between states are not settled peacefully they may pose a danger to the maintenance of international peace and security. Nor can it be denied that we are obligated under the provisions of the Charter to try to settle our disputes peacefully. Surely it can only be helpful for governments to compare notes on the subject based on their experience over the past 21 years.

Thirdly, it was said that the Charter already contains all the means required for the peaceful settlement of disputes, that no new machinery is required and that what is important is that states
