academic distinction nor an Oxford cachet but to attain comprehension of the point of view of the English speaking peoples.

I hope you will not think that I am not grateful for your letter and glad to be made acquainted with all points of view. Even if there is some incorrectness about what has been said and what you have heard, nothing but good can come out of your passing it on, since it makes it possible to correct at least some false impressions.

Yours faithfully,

Wilfrid Bovey.
