I was so surprised that I could not answer. It fairly took my breath away. He gave one more look full of pride at the word, and we went back to the house. On the way he fold my with house. On the way he told me, with a garrulity unusual with him, of what had leaving me a flower and his card, until I sisted of a sort of "vampire-trap," from which the performer was to be shot up into the air 20 or 30 feet, and to alight on a stage there—and how that Harry had just met the French gentleman's require ments, both from his skill and his girlish annearance, because the excitement to midland village, where we were unknown, and our antecedents unsuspected.

Azalea took the town.

my father began.

"Bah!" cried the other, and bounded out of the room. In doing so he nearly tumbled over me, as I crouched weeping in the passage, so that I cried out. He stepped aside—started—rapped out a French oath—and darting into the room he had just quitted, slammed-to the door. There was a long conversation in subdued volces, and when at length he quitted the house his face was radiant and his courtesy profuse. On the mat he presented me with the rose from his button hole, and he kissed the tips of the tight gloves he seemed to have been born in, all the way as he bucked down the steps out into the middle of the road.

"You see," I urged, "there is a barrier between us which nothing can overleap. Would to heaven you could have believed this, and spared me this humiliation."
He took my hand.
"Monne," he said, "be my wife."
"No, no, no," I protested; "consider your position, your family, the friends it would estrange, the contempt it would bring upon you. I dare not!"
But my protestations were in vain. He prevailed, because he loved me, and because I returned that love, O, sotruly, so utterly! I became his happy wife—happy, yes; and yet one little cloud would hover in the blue expanse of my married life.
