Public Policy and Public Attitudes: The Future of York and the University System (continued)

category of expenditure at York, where most academic or support programs are not allocated what they believe they would need to do their jobs properly. In each of the following areas, York is said to be falling short of what is necessary or prudent or academically sound:

- full-time faculty salaries (2.5 percent behind the system average);
- full-time faculty complement (complaints that our proportion of part-time faculty is far too high in some areas);
- preventative maintenance programs (far below accepted standard);
- academic equipment needs (particularly in Science, Fine Arts, and Computing);
- flexibility for program development (practically non-existent);
- staffing levels in service departments (these were static during 50 percent increase in enrolments);
- library (near bottom of system, by some measures);
- athletics and recreation (underfunded vis-à-vis program and community size);
- institutional promotion and constituency cultivation;
- scholarship and bursary funding (well below other universities).

How to alleviate those deficiencies is York's preoccupation in budgetary planning for 1984-85. Ontario has a magnificent university system of strength, diversity, and quality. We have human resources unmatched in potential and capacity. If we cannot tap that potential and fulfil our capacity, we shall fail the universities and the youth of this province. To do so is to deny our future. That should be the focus of our public debate.
