they did. Here is a subject in which every Newfoundland boy or girl can take an interest.

The Beothucks wrote no books and so we have to piece their history together from the observations of people who saw them from time to time and from relics: that is from things left behind by them and found here and there in the country. Here is a chance for boys and girls—to find relics of Beothucks.

There was a boy attending a school in Newfoundland not so long ago called James P. Howley. He was always very fond of nature and when he became a man he travelled the country a great deal and was always on the look-out for the relics of Indians. The consequence was that he gathered together a great deal of information about this mysterious tribe and shortly before his death (which occurred early in the year 1918) he published a large and splendid book on this subject.

Perhaps some boy or girl can think of names of places in Newfoundland that show that Indians once inhabited the country and were seen by the early British colonists. Here are two or three: Red Indian Lake; Indian Burying Place; Indian Arm; Indian Islands. Who can add to the list?
