He received incoming and discharged out going freight. He looked after the con-tents of the warehouse. He made out way bills and kept an eye open for new business. The task of spying out the new land was accepted joydely by the lad. At the back of his mind was always his private estimate of the forming value of the land. When the Red River carts moved over the prairie on their long journey northward, he watched the ruts made in the soft black soil. He saw that the following season the grass grew lush and heavy where the under earth had been thrown up and exposed to heat and moisture. This, he reflected, was the proof of great fertility. It meant that at some tuture day splendid crops would reward the labor of the coming husband man. He was always gathering facts and thinking, silently thinking, of the steamboats, tiring out the captain and the energetic. He rode up and down on the segineer with his questions.
