Rippling Rhymes

SMALL TRAITORS.
Some skates are thinking treason, and others talk the same; in due and proper season we'll spoil their foolish games. The Government's interfering some spiers every day, who seemed to have a yearning to go the Teuton way; our Uncle Sam will boot them until his patience breaks, and then perhaps he'll shoot them with rusty nails and rods. One cheap and noisy traitor will make a lot more noise, a shooting off his crater, than fifty loyal boys; so when he's high in the air, and pawing up the ground, we think there's lot of treason a-circulating round. But when you count your traitors they're mighty hard to find, and they have in their gallers the coldest kind of feet. I often hear of fellows who sympathize with Teuts, who like to work their bellows like traitorous galoots; but when you catch them and read the plot act, to read them and remind them of many a loyal fact, their patriotic manner disarms me right away; they love the spangled banner, they love us as any day. Dame Rumor is too busy to drum us up swerves; it keeps a fellow busy to follow all her curves. She points to Dick and Harry, and says they're traitors; at once we start to howl. To blast man's reputation by charges illly made won't help preserve the nation, or make the foe afraid.
