A Mysterious Disappearance. As the train rattled along through the darkness the stranger who had join-ed another, stranger and myself in the the darkness the stranger who had joined another, stranger and myself in the smoking compartment stopped, short in telling the tale he had begun, lit a fresh tigar and remarked: "Well, gentlemen, you won't believe it anyway, but it's a true story. I give you my word. It actually happened."

He looked like a man whose word one might take; at least the risk was fair, as risks of that sort go, and the second occupant of the smoking car expressed himself to that effect.

"Well, then," the stranger resumed, "it happened in Paris. I forget 'the

I forget 'the me of the hotel, but it was a quiet, semi-fashionable sort of place on the right bank of the Seine, in one of those right bank of the Seine, in one of those sechuled streets that you can find almost anywhere if you know how to look for them. I was waiting for some friends of mine, a mother and her two daughters, who were touring Italy. They had written me that they would be on almost any day. In fact, 4t their request I had engaged two rooms for them, one of which the mother was to occupy, the two daughters the other. They were ordinary rooms.

Moreover, the rooms were furnished just alike—high beds, dull red carpets, old-fashioned tapestry and wall, paper of a peculiar brown color.

"In the morning, as I had been requested. I knocked at the daughters door. We were going to see the city to gether and we wanted to start betimes." "Ten minutes later both girls came to me, looking rather anxious and distressed. They could get no answer from their mother nor could they get into her room. Both doors to her room were looked. We immediately summoned the proprietor.

And both of us shook our heads.
"Well," said the stranger, "the mother had been stricken with smallpox that night. Not wishing to alarm her daughters, she had sent for the proprietor and asked him to call a doctor. And when the Frenchman learned from him what the disease was from which his guest suffered, be became alarmed over what night happen to his summer business and the reputation of his hotel, and her boys."—Boston Record.

There wasn't a trunk—not a thing anywhere to show that the room had been occupied. Even the bed clothing and the brass bed itself, which stood where the high wooden arrangement had stood the night before, gave no signs of having been used."

The stranger looked out of the car window, as if trying to discern in the darkness where we were going. Then turning to face us, after a second or two, he concluded his story with: "Just to darkness where a second or two, he concluded his story with: "Just to relieve your minds of suspense, I'm going to tell you that the mother was discovered.
