The Broken Circle!

CHAPTER XXII
If Hettie ever breathed it, I would send her from us. Yet to-day I grieve that I cursed my eldest child. What do you think," added Martin, after a short pause, "of the choice my daughters made?"

"I think Miss Hettie one of the most devoted, most unselfish girl in the world," answered the baronet.

"And what do you think of the other?" asked Martin Ray.

"What can I think?" said Sir Basil. "What could any man think of a girl who deserts her own father and clings to a stranger?"

"You condemn her then?" questioned Martin Ray, eagerly.

"It is not my place to judge or condemn. Perhaps she could put the matter in a way which would make it appear quite different; but, so far as I can see, I should say that Miss Hettie was by far the more noble of the two. I should think her sister selfish, and certainly wanting in nobility of character—wanting, too, in natural affection, if she could desert her father and cling to a stranger."

"I have never been the same man since," said Martin Ray, with a sigh. "I should hardly have thought that two sisters could have differed so greatly," remarked Sir Basil, quite unconscious that by his own words he was condemning the girl he had asked to be his wife.

"I should like to know," said Martin Ray, with a haggard face, "if curses ever really cause evil. I should like to know if that proud, beautiful head will bend under the curse I laid upon it?"

"I hope not," answered Sir Basil, quietly.

Martin turned to him suddenly. "Promise me," he said, "that you will not reveal one word of what I have told you. Hettie believes that I have forgotten her sister. I wish her still to think so."

"I shall never speak of it," promised Sir Basil. "You may rely upon me."

But as he went home he thought much of the story he had just heard. What a strange thing that two sisters should differ so greatly—that one should be so noble, so full of self-sacrifice and that the other should leave her father and go away with a stranger! He admired Hettie more than ever.

"She has an angelic face and an angelic nature," he said to himself.

"It is not often that the two go together."
He remembered the story when he saw Leah. So perfectly unconscious was he that she was the heroine of it that he thought to himself how grandly Leah would have acted in the circumstances; he felt sure that she, too, would have gone to her father's side and have stood by him against the whole world.

When he called again at the cottage, Martin was very ill, and Hettie in great distress. She looked to him more beautiful than ever, her blue eyes filled with tears, her lovely face so full of sorrow and compassion. He watched her preparing with deft fingers all that Martin needed. He thought of the heavy burden laid upon those young shoulders, and he wondered again at the heartlessness of the sister who could have left it all for her to bear. His heart went out to her, as he believed in simple pity. It was such a hard life.

"I wish," he said, approaching her, "that I could do something for you."
"You have done a great deal for me," she replied, with a quick, bright smile.

"Have I? What is it, Miss Hettie?"
"You have given me comfort by speaking so kindly."

"If I know how to give you comfort," said Sir Basil quickly, "I would ask for nothing more. I cannot tell you how sorry I am to see you so sorely tried. Let me lift that heavy tray for you. Those little white hands of yours were never made for hard work like this."

"I think," she said, smiling through her tears, "that you would be amazed to see how much what you call my 'little white hands' can do between sewing and writing. It seems to me they travel many miles each day."

Sir Basil stood by quite helpless. He saw how anxious and distressed Hettie was, and he thought with bitterness of the sister who had left her. Something of what filled his heart was shown in his manner, and in some vague way they understood each other. Without words, something was acknowledged by both—his sympathy, her gratitude for it, his kindly affection, and her pleasure in it.

Sir Basil did not stay long; but when he bade Hettie farewell something was in each face which had never been there before, some new feeling stirred each heart. They said good-night hurriedly, with averted faces; but in Hettie's heart there was a thrill of something like new life, and in Sir Basil's strange, tumultuous happiness that he hardly understood.

Leah wondered more than ever the preoccupied manner of her lover. Was he thinking of her? Was it the future that troubled him? Was he dreaming of politics? The last thing in this world that she would have suspected was that he was thinking of her long-lost sister Hettie.

CHAPTER XXXIII
The time came when Sir Basil Carlton stood face to face with the knowledge of his own secret, when he said to himself that, if marriages were made in heaven, Hettie was the one woman intended for him, that she was the only woman in this world he could ever love. She stood out quite distinct and clear to him. He knew that at last he had met the love that was his doom, that he—Sir Basil Carlton, engaged to marry the great heiress, Leah Hatton—loved with his whole heart Hettie Ray, the daughter of a man whose name seemed to be hated and despised among the class of which he himself was a prominent member. That Hettie was poor and unknown, that she was the daughter of such a father, he cared nothing. If he had been free, he would have pleaded his suit, he would have taken her in his arms and never let her go until she had promised to be his wife. As it was, knowing that he loved her, he must look upon her face only once again, and then it must be to say farewell.

He marvelled within himself at the strange fate that had befallen him. The woman who loved him better than her own life was beautiful as a goddess, and she would bring to her husband, both money and lands yet his heart did not incline to her. He was grateful to her, fond of her, but he did not love her with the love that comes but once in life.

She had loved him; and, because her happiness was dear to him, because her words had told him that her life was wrapped up in his, because he was heart-whole and fanny-free, he had asked her to marry him. And, now that he was bound in faith and honor to her, he had met the one woman who seemed to have been made for him. He was perplexed, agitated. He loved one woman with his whole heart, and had promised to marry another. Which way did honor lie? Was it best to keep the promise, to go away and never look on Hettie's fair face again, to give up the one love that might have blessed his life, and marry the woman he did not love, but to whom he was in honor bound? Which was best? Was it honorable to marry without love, or was it most honorable to break all other ties and marry the one truly beloved?

He had not sought his fate; he had been almost asked to marry Leah; so much had been said to him that, without being absolutely cruel, he could not have done otherwise; and now he found that he had made himself miserable for life.

"I wish," he cried to himself, in vain reproach, "that I had not been so impetuous. If I had waited but one year longer!"

Sir Basil was dissatisfied with himself; look which way he would, he had reason for self-reproach. He should have taken more time to think over the subject, and knowing himself bound in honor to Leah, he should have been more careful about Hettie. He knew now that he had loved Hettie at first sight; he ought not to have yielded to the temptation of seeing her a second time. When he found that morning, noon, and night the fair face with its halo of golden hair haunted him, he should have known the reason.

He stood face to face with this one face at last—that wealth, title, fame, grandeur, nothing that earth could give him was of any value unless with it he had the love of Hettie Ray. He was in despair.

"Who is it that directs this power we call love?" he asked himself. "Why can I not love the woman I must marry? Why can I not marry the woman I love?"

Looking forward through the possible years of a long life, he saw no gleam of brightness; there could be no happiness in a future unshared by Hettie Ray.

Increases the action of the intestines

Hundreds of men and women have already found freedom from laxatives by eating Fleischmann's fresh yeast.

Doctors are now agreed that proper elimination of waste matter should be brought about by food. One doctor comes right out and states plainly that the indigestible waste of cathartics is one of the causes of constipation.

Physicians all over the country are recommending Fleischmann's fresh yeast because it is a fresh food, rich in those elements which keep the intestinal health. In one series of tested cases, several functions were restored in from 3 days to 5 weeks.

Try it out for yourself. Begin by breaking 1/2 oz. of Fleischmann's Yeast to your everyday diet. Keep it up and see how normally and regularly your intestines act. Do not let it be a "one-time" yeast—the familiar tin-foliated package with the yellow label. Place a standing order with your grocer.

Fads and Fashions.
The vogue for the bouffant skirt is practically over. Heavy laces and crepes are combined in many models. A sheath gown of white moire has a train of acerist tulle. The girlish is a very important feature of the present mode. Brilliant hat pins are used in the dark little horsehair turbans. Fine French stockinette is a material popular for sports wear. The swathed line is generally accepted for the evening gown. New evening wraps of huge proportions have "tulle" collars. The Turkish shawl has returned, but this time reaching the ankles. The fancy girlish, either embroidered or twisted, is in favor.

Beaded Georgette crepe gowns continue to be popular for the afternoon. A felt hat of French blue shows the upper part of its brim in straw. On the brim of a white organdie hat perch two crisp organdie lilies. A unique coat for summer is made of chinis bound with carpet tape. A fad of the season is to put the train of the evening gown in front. A frock of figured crepe de chine is scalloped and bound with white crepe.

Gland That Makes Growth.

In the future the terrible tabloid is likely to play a very important role. It is possible that instead of a five-course dinner we shall be treated—those of us who may still be on this planet—to five tabloids which, combined, furnish all the necessary nutriment for the human body.

It appears that tabloids of the pineal gland are capable of making any fowl grow to double its ordinary size. This is a delightful prospect for a Sunday dinner. We have put up with the all-neck-and-legs chicken quite long enough. Now there seems to be a chance of getting a "splendid bird" in actual fact.

We read everywhere that if the output is doubled, prices will be halved. Well, if every chicken bred is twice as big as chickens are in the habit of being, surely that is doubled productivity, and chickens will be—dead cheap.

Fancy a giant chicken at half the former price! Fancy the poultryer's boy staggering to your domicile with one of the size of a well-favoured turkey! That's the start to give us!

This pineal gland stunt seems to be the very thing we have been waiting for. But it will be as well not to apply it too freely.

Just Folks

HOME.
Here's where the sweetest laughter rings.
Here's where the praise is good.
Here's where the merriest robbin sings.
And not in the distant wood—
Here at the end of my little street
Is all that maketh life's struggle sweet.

Here's where the fairest of blossoms grow.
Here's where the smallest and few:
Here is the friendliest tree I know.
Faithful and staunch and true!
Here in these walls by the weather stained
Is all the splendor of life contained.

Here's where the mother and child await
The day and its tolling end.
Here by the side of my humble grate
We welcome our truest friend;
Over this roof as the years go by
Are the brightest stars and the clearest sky.

Here are my dreams and the distant goal.
Here is the life I build,
This I am striving for, heart and soul;
Here till my hands are stilled
Always and ever I want to see
Love at the window on watch for me.

Nothing of joy could my strength attain
If ever these walls should fall;
Pomp and glory and wealth were vain
Were I to possess them all.
If there was no home on a little street
To make the "struggle" for victory sweet.

Art to Tower
Dominions.

An interesting proposal is now under discussion in London. It is no less than to send a travelling picture gallery on a tour throughout the Dominions. It is pointed out that the big London picture galleries, such as the Tate, the National galleries, the Victoria and Albert Museums and the British Museum have such large numbers of pictures on their walls that they are quite able to spare a sufficient number for the purpose. Such an exhibition of world mastery would have great artistic and educational value in distant borders of the Empire, where in no other way could they become known. It would stimulate the interest of the artistic overseas, and at the same time appease the art hunger of others who cannot visit Britain to see these pictures for themselves.

Oldest Milking Cow.

A grade Shorthorn cow 39 years old and still giving milk enough to make about four pounds of butter a week, has been found by dairy professors of the Ohio State University on the farm of Miss Libby Hamilton, five miles southeast of Columbus. This is thought to be the oldest milking cow in Ohio, and possibly in the United States. Miss Hamilton, who is 80 years old, has had "Rexy" since April, 1892, when "Rexy" was born. The cow is now almost three times the average age, say the University dairymen, and is to be regarded as a curiosity, equal to a person 100 years old, or older. Quite as remarkable as "Rexy's" age is the fact that she has a daughter, eight years old, having freshened at the age of 31.
