

as being all that is worth while, or so nearly all that is worth while that they are willing to take chances of getting their share of what is left over. The doctrine that Man is completely equipped to take care of himself Here as well as There is never preached. In matters of health he is encouraged to believe that his spirit does not control his body, and that when he is sick he is the victim of an "act of Providence," whatever that means. As to "Sin," he is taught that he didn't start it, can't stop it, and can only escape from its penalties by "clinging to the Cross." To change Man's attitude towards Infinity; to uplift him into a consciousness of being his own Infinity; to stir his Reason into grasping the fact that he is perfectly equipped for every emergency; to point him to the power he has within him to grapple with sickness and sin, is the aim of The Thinking Universe. That its logic will be at once accepted by the Theologians is not expected, nor is it feared that all the seed sown will fall upon rocks and desert places and fail to germinate. The comforting thought remains with us that no matter what happens Man will go on Reasoning until he becomes Positive in his Rightness, and the Universe will continue Thinking, always Positive in its Rightness. There is no end. Until we meet again,

SALUTAMUS.
