THE ADOPTED SON

"If the young lady were not dead," murmured the sister, "I should say it was simply a coincidence, and that the spirit of the departed was actually confined to natural objects. In that state the natural senses are unimpaired, and what was in it faded, you say, from your sight—but the presence of the spirit is exceedingly active and acute. The mind is freed from the trammels of the body, and time and space become as nothing to it. It sees distant objects as if they were present—just as you thought yourself in that room, when you were often thousand miles away, and as Swedenborg so distinctly saw as to minutely describe during its progress a fire occurring in Stockholm when he was as far distant as Germany. It has been observed in all countries and all ages of the world; and Apollonius, a Latin author who wrote in the second century, speaks of it as common in his day, and accurately describes it. It gives us a faint conception of the power, which shall possess when our souls are released from our material bodies. In us this power is dull and abstract, but in our Lord it was entirely normal and coincident with His natural senses, as was spirit sight and all the other spiritual senses and powers which it was by it that he saw Nathaniel when among ten thousand fishes (the one with the sinner in his mouth) and possessed the memory of the sinner's name when he was forty-nine hundred miles away; and, more strikingly, when he beheld beforehand the destruction of Jerusalem, his eye passing through all the complications and contingencies of coming events. For forty years, and seeing the terrible catastrophe in all its details—the city encompassed with armies, and burned in every side; the towers that were due about it, the people with not one stone left upon another; and the Jewish people falling by the side of the sword, and carried away captive among all nations.

mind can picture—will be yours forever." After a few moments' pause, as if from a natural hesitation to unshrink himself to a stranger, the young man said, "I have been impressed in the affairs of life, Madam, but I have not been altogether unimpaired of my Creator. I recognize my accountability to Him, and am convinced that the character I form here will remain with me in the Hereafter, and will decide my condition and surroundings there. But with my present views, I should be guilty of idolatry if I accorded any more honor to Jesus than to Socrates, Confucius, Socrates, Marcus Aurelius, and a few other great and good men who have lived in the world."

"You are that young man in the Gospels," she said, "who had kept views upon you; but they have given all these things, from his youth up, me comfort, and they may do the like for you."

"I shall welcome any light you can give me on this important subject," he answered. "If I know no more, I am ready to accept the truth, though it is, and however much it may conflict with my present opinions, I will not be contented."

"The opening of your spiritual eyes," she continued, "so that you saw us who were about you, as points across the clairvoyant state, the only argument against your having seen the young lady as she was, alive and on earth in the report that she is dead—I should question her death, unless I had positive and reliable evidence of it. The only other explanation of the occurrence that I can give, is that spirits, being the power, do not appear to us as realities. It is possible that they showed you a vision of the young woman as she was just before she died, that you might know that her thoughts were absolutely fixed upon you to the very last. It is possible that she died from grief over your loss."

"It was so, Richard. She is dead!" said Mr. Lamson, who had entered the room while the Sister was speaking. "I have found a notice of her death in both the Boston Transcript and Advertiser. It was not in the death column, but among the editorials, and for that reason I have overlooked it till now."

The young man buried his face in his hands, and sat for some moments without speaking. The last faint hope which had for a moment dawned upon him, had come and gone.

"The Sister was the first to speak. 'You have been sorely stricken, my dear friend,' she said, 'and no words of ours will avail to comfort you. But do you not, while you mourn a human loss, forget the love of our Lord, who all your life has carried you in his arms, and sheltered you in his bosom? Your human love has been taken from you, and you are desolate. You would not be so, had your supreme affection been set on Him. No human love, had you it in possession, would fill your soul.' Mrs. Browning is right in saying:—

'Nor man nor nature satisfy Whom only God created.'

"I know what your belief is, Madam," said Richard, in a most kind tone. "But I have been educated in a faith which has taught me that Christ can help me no more—and not so much—as my dear friends here, Mr. and Mrs. Lamson, and Isabel."

"I understand," she answered. "You have been taught that Christ was a mere man, that the gospel histories are myths, and the miracles, impossible things. I knew all for I was myself brought up in that faith, and I lived in that land of ice, and snow, and desolation, till I was a woman grown. Then one day a heavy blow crushed me to the earth, as you have been crushed. For long I lay there, stunned, and in the darkness. Then a faint gleam of light broke in upon me, and following it, I came out to where the sun is shining on a day that never sets. And you will find that light, if you follow it as I did. And when you have found it, all human love will be swallowed up in the Divine love. Then you will see that Jesus—whom you now esteem only a man—is in reality the one and only being who is worthy of the supreme devotion of the soul. You will not love your lost one the less, but you will love Him the more, and He will lead you at the last to where she—more loving and beautiful than your
