Martin's companion on that occasion dived several times, but was unable to find the body. Friday, strangely enough, a man rowing out in a boat near the spit where the Princess Victoria is moored, saw the body floating on the water not more than 300 yards from the spot where it went down, and brought it in. An inquest was held by Coroner McGuigan. A certificate was presented showing that Martin had applied for a position in the customs service at Hongkong, but had to be rejected as it was found that bands have been engaged, among which he was suffering from heart disease. It caused heart failure and he sank, unable to make an effort. A verdict of identified was found Friday floating in the water near Hastings. It was dreadfully decomposed, the flesh having been all eaten away from the head boots. He was either a very old man or had been in the water a very long time, as with the exception of one eyetooth, all his teeth were gone.
