NUMBER 46.

A SCOTCH STORY.

It was a stormy evening, and in one of the wild desolate valleys of the Highlands three men were walking quickly, that they might reach shelter before the storm burst upon them in all its fury.

They had travelled thirty miles that day; and the house at which they were to pass the night was still ten miles distant. The wind howled among the cliffs of the valley, and the fakes of mow began to beat in their faces.

"It will be a terrible night, lads, in the Moray Firth," said the forement traveller, a strong should-red, broad chasted man; "but what is that" so we she was sick and not able to work; but she wo'd stave sooner than part with it; and wouldnathe pointing to a little figure by the side of the foad.

The figure arose and came and meet them. Slow and feeble were the steps, and as he approached, they saw it was a boy about ten years of age.

The figure arose and came and meet them.

Slow and seeble were the steps, and as he approached, they saw it was a boy about ten years of age.

"O, my pure boy!" said Sandy Wright, "what are have taken you here in a night like this?"

The boy told him his mother had died and left him alone, and that he was going to Edinburgh to see the same that he was going to Edinburgh to see the same that he was going to Edinburgh to see the same that he was going to Edinburgh to see the same that he was going to Edinburgh to see the same that he was going to Edinburgh to see the same that he was going to Edinburgh to see the same that he was going to Edinburgh to see the same that he was going to Edinburgh to see the same that he was going to Edinburgh to see the same that he was going to Edinburgh to see the same that the same th named are sorrowning, "Im tired and transor walk further, and I'll be lost I'm feared in the snow drift."

"That ye winns, my puir barin, if I can help it," father was a young man of good family, but said the boatman; and taking the boy's hand, he call the boatman; and taking the boy's hand, he fold him to lean upon him. But the boy was much exhausted to walk, though sided by the trious woman, who was worthy of a better hus-
