THE following description of the sacking and burning of the city of Antwerp—till that time the first commercial city in Europe—is taken from "The Rise of the Dutch Republic," by Motley. The event is known in history by the dread name of "the Spanish Fury," and is a terrible illustration of the horrors perpetrated by the Spaniards in the Netherlands whilst under the rule of Philip II. of Spain, and his lieutenant, the Duke of Alva, who, whilst in the Netherlands, had sent no less than 18,000 persons to the scaffold:—

who, whilst in the Netherlands, had sent no less than 18,000 persons to the scaffold:—

"Meantime, while the short November day was fast declining, the combat still raged in the interior of the city. Various currents of conflicts, forcing their separate way through many streets, had at last mingled in the Grande Place.

From every window and balcony a hot fire was poured into the square, as, pent in a corner, the burghers stood at last at bay. It was difficult to carry the houses by storm, but they were soon set on fire.

The conflagration spread with rapidity, house after house, street after street, taking fire. Nearly a thousand buildings, in the most splendid and wealthy quarter of the city, were soon in a blaze, and multitudes of human beings were burned with them. In the City-hall many were consumed, while others leaped from the windows to renew the combat below. The many tortuous streets which led down a slight descent from the rear of the Town-house to the quays were all one vast conflagration. On the other side, the magnificent cathedral, separated from the Grand Place by a single row of buildings, was lighted up but not attacked by the flames. The tall spire cast its gigantic shadow across the last desperate conflict. In the street called the Canal au Sucre, immediately behind the Town-house, there was a ficree struggle, a horrible massacre. A crowd of burghers, grave magistrates, and such of the German soldiers as remained alive, still confronted the ferocious Spaniards. There, amid the flaming desolation, Goswyn Verreyck, the heroic margrave of the city, fought with the energy of hatred and despair. The burgomaster, Van de Meere, lay dead
