How it all Ended.

GUY FOSTER pressed the little hand passionately, looking in the upturned face all the while.

'Ellen dearest, will you be my wife?' he asked, simply.

Ellen Dalmer turned her head away, and her lover saw the annoyed look on her face. Instintively he dropped his hands.

'What does this mean, Ellen? Surely you are not trifling with me?'

'This has gone too far, Mr. Foster. Had you been less impulsive, I should have saved you the pain of being refused. I am another man's promised wife,' she said proudly.

For the first time, Guy Foster saw—there was yet light enough for that—the flash of the diamond engagement ring.

'So the neighbors are correct, for once in their lives. Allow me to congratulate you. To be an old man's darling is better——.

'Than a young man's slave. Very true, Mr. Foster, especially if the old man is to my liking. You scoff at the idea. Be it so; I do not care. You might have known that I should prove a total failure as a poor man's wife.'

'Hence you have sold yourself for gold. Well, I only hope it will bring you happiness. Good evening, Miss Dalmer.' And raising his hat, and bowing low, Guy Foster was gone.

Ellen Dalmer watched him out of sight, then, with a sigh, she proceeded in-doors. Was she sorry? Perhaps so. She didn't allow herself any time to answer the question, for she busied herself with her toilette until the old man who was to crown her ambition arrived. As for Guy Foster, his feelings of despair soon gave way to those of indignation. All the love he once had for her dwindled and lost itself in contempt. Like all true lovers, he could not think that money was first to be considered. True, he was poor, but he was young also.

The wedding came off in grand style, and Ellen Dalmer became the stately Mrs. Howard, the wife of an admiral. Surely her ambitious dream was realized. Of course she lived but to adorn her husband's palatial home, so Glendale lost her.

So the years passed. Guy Foster had left the neighborhood before the wedding took place, in order to resume his profession, that of law. At the end of five years, we find him in London, with a large and rapidly increasing practice. Save that he is stouter and manlier, there is very little alteration in his looks since the day we first saw him.

He was seated in his office, busily immersed in law papers, one day; he did not hear the tap at his door. A woman's voice aroused him.

'Excuse me, sir, but there was no one to announce me. Can I see Mr. Foster?'

'I am he;' and looking up, he saw the well-known face of Ellen Howard. How changed she was! But he would have known the magnetic eyes anywhere.

There was a moment's silence as the lady tottered to a chair. Guy Foster took the enamelled card she handed him, as if to read her name.

'Mrs. Howard, I believe. What can I do for you?'

'Perhaps you may think me foolish, but, since the Admiral's death I don't think his lawyer has done his best. I've determined to call in other aid. Your name being known to me I resolved to call here.'

Guy Foster bowed stiffly. He had heard of the Admiral's death.

'I do not wish to interfere, Mrs. Howard. it would be better to keep with the firm that the Admiral trusted while living.'

There was a look of agony on the woman's face. He never could know what pain his words caused her. The cold man before her evidently did not guess her real reason for coming.

'Very well, Mr. Foster. Of course I had no intention of changing, as far as my late husband's affairs were concerned. I merely referred to my own private business which I have shamefully neglected.' And the woman gave a yearning glance towards the partly turned face.

He seemed to be busy thinking. A movement of the lady's attracted his attention.

'I beg pardon for being so inattentive. I was merely making a memorandum in my mind. Being a lawyer I am entirely at your service.'

He bowed very gallantly, and in doing so, looked unfalteringly, for the first time, at the woman before him.

She saw a face which time had beatified; evidently an uneasy conscience was not his.

'Will you call at my house during your leisure? The business is not very urgent, but I'm such a child where law is concerned, that any one can cheat me. When may I expect you?' she asked.

'I can hardly promise, my time is so much engaged. You may expect me at say hour.'

And with, this, Guy Foster found himself showing the stately lady to her carriage. He pretended not to see the hand stretched out to him as she bade him good afternoon. He merely bowed and retired, then withdrew to his office, as matter-of-fact as you please. There was no sentiment at this meeting—at least, on his part.

It was near the end of the week when he called at Mrs. Howard's house at the West End. The woman who had invited him there was very well pleased to greet him again She would have forgotten all about the business which had brought him had he not spoken of it.

'The afternoon will be all gone before I shall have a chance to even get a look at what I am to do. Will you——'

'Oh, yes. How thoughtless of me, Mr. Foster!' And, with a laugh, she rang for a servant to conduct him to the library.

On second thought, she determined to go herself, so she dismissed her servant.

'After all, it isn't much—only poor pa's homestead—I wish to release it from its encumbrances. I value that more than the rest besides. So many happy days where passed there,' she said, as they presently found themselves alone in the library.

Of course he knew what it meant, but he wilfully misunderstood her.

'I should say they were poor days, Mrs. Howard, and consequently unhappy ones. They became so insignificant when compared with after days. When one is ambitious, as you know, they are only happy with hopes fulfilled.'

The woman said nothing, only she gave the papers a nervous twitch. With a laugh, she arose, saying, 'Well, I don't intend to do the business myself, so here are the papers. I'm afraid you'll feel angry at me for taking up so much of your valuable time.'

'Not at all,' he said, coldly.

Then there was silence. He could do very little that afternoon, for already the long summer day had come to a close. Promising to call the week following, he left her.

The business of settlement, which at first seemed so simple, took longer than he thought it would. The result was that he made frequent visits to the house. Then was Ellen Howard glad. She showed it in every action. What would she not have given to have Guy Foster all her own again? His studied coldness, however, caused her to despair. At last he finished the business, and so he told the humbled woman who was hungry for his love.

'And this is to be the end of all! I'm really sorry, Guy.'

This was the first time the old name had crossed her lips in five long years. He heard it with a frown.

'Certainly, Mrs. Howard. You seem to like law better than most people. I should think you'd be glad to be relieved of it.'

'Perhaps so. Won't you call again?' she asked pleadingly.

'What would plain Guy Foster have in common with the rich and stately Mrs. Howard?' he frigidly asked.

'Everything! Can you forget the past so easily?'

'Yes. I have other things to think of. You, in the height of your success, have of course forgotten it long ago, I was merely a foolish boy then.

'Listen to me, Guy Foster. You have chosen to misunderstand me. Does my face look as if I had been happy? I need scarcely ask, since you have eyes. I was once foolish enough to think that gold alone brought happiness. The result is I am a miserable woman who would give all for—But I am weak enough already in your eyes. Spare me a further confession.'

Unmoved, he stood still while she partly recovered herself. With a bowed head she tottered to a chair.

'I was not prepared for this scene; had I foreseen it I should have explained all. In other words I should have saved you the pain of being refused. Mrs. Howard, I am another woman's husband.'

There was a suppressed scream; but that was all. The next minute Ellen Howard was herself again.

'You might have told me this before,' she said, sternly.

'I did not come here to discuss my private affairs Mrs. Howard. Having broached the subject, I will say that my wife is an old acquaintance of yours. Caroline Farmer was her maiden name. I have never regretted that she was persuaded to change it. But I fear I am getting prosy; good day, Mrs. Howard;' and thus they parted.

She had been bitterly punished; she saw it all when it was too late, like a great many others. So she rose with a bitter heart, as weeping and moaning would not bring him back. She thought of Guy in his happy home. Fate had been remorseless, indeed, to her in the end.

Ayer's Cathartic Pills,

For all the purposes of a Family Physic, and for curing Costiveness, Jaundice, Indigestion, Foul Stomach, Breath, Headache, Erysipelas, Rheumatism, Eruptions and Skin Diseases, Biliousness, Dropsy, Tumors, Worms, Neuralgia, as a Dinner Pill, for Purifying the Blood,

Are the most effective and congenial purgative ever discovered. They are mild, but effectual in their operation, moving the bowels surely and without pain. Although gentle in their operation, they are still the most thorough and searching cathartic medicine that can be employed: cleansing the stomach and bowels, and even the blood. In small doses of one pill a day, they stimulate the digestive organs and promote vigorous health.

AYER'S PILLS have been known for more than a quarter of a century, and have obtained a world-wide reputation for their virtues. They correct diseased action in the several assimilative organs of the body, and are so composed that obstructions within their range can rarely withstand or evade them. Not only do they cure the every-day complaints of everybody, but also formidable and dangerous diseases that have baffled the best of human skill. While they produce powerful effects, they are, at the same time, the safest and best physic for children. By their aperient action they gripe much less than the common purgatives, and never give pain when the bowels are not inflamed. They reach the vital fountains of the blood, and strengthen the system by freeing it from the elements of weakness.

Adapted to all ages and conditions in all climates, containing neither calomel nor any deleterious drug, these Pills may be taken with safety by anybody. Their sugar-coating preserves them ever fresh, and makes them pleasant to take; while being purely vegetable, no harm can arise from their use in any quantity.
