The Loom Girl of Lowell. By William Mason Turner, M. D. (Continued.)

"Ay! this matter must be investigated to-night, if necessary," ejaculated young Gray, grimly, as he wheeled down a large aisle, and made his way toward the further end of the mill, where a light could be seen gleaming through the windows of a room. A moment, and the young man reached the spot, and opened a door. The apartment in which he stood was the office, or the counting-room. It was well lighted, and revealed the usual paraphernalia of such a room.

Upon a lounge in the apartment lay a young man fast asleep. He was one of the several clerks of the establishment. He had lingered long to-night to balance his books, and when his work had been finished, had yielded to the seductive attractions of the lounge, there falling quietly placed it in his pocket. "The first part of that communication don't understand," he muttered. Where is that money-Cartwright & Cannon's check for $4,895? Philip Frone has said nothing to me of this sale, nor have I found an entry made of receipt of such an amount of money on our books. This is strange; perhaps Mr. Frone can explain it. He must." At that moment a rap fell on the door, and a brawny mill-hand entered the room, QUEEN ST., FREDERICTON ray; I was busy at the—__'

"Not so loud, Ellis! let him sleep," nterrupted Gray, pointing to the clerk. I only wanted to see you a moment. Were there any goods shipped recently from the mills to Messrs. Cartwright & Cannon, of Boston?" The man pondered a moment. "I can tell you in a second, sir," he

JUST RECEIVED.

"No, sir," was the prompt reply. "Have you made any entry of money received from the firm just mentioned?"

VOL. I, NO. 92.

"No, sir," again answered the clerk. "Yet, if such money had been received, it was your duty to make the entry?" continued young Gray, as if musing with his own thoughts.

"Certainly, sir." Ellwood Gray turned away, and for a moment strode up and down the floor. But he paused and said:

You had better go, now, Thomas. 'Tis past eleven o'clock. 'Early to bed and early to rise, you know, my boy." man drew on his overcoat as once, and bidding his kind-hearted employer good-night, he left'the mills. Ellwood Gray gazed around him with a frowning brow. He looked like a man who was suddenly, yet not altogether unexpectedly, called upon to front a disagreeable duty. Though there was pain and distress in his features at the prospect before him, yet there was not the least sign of shrinking. The young man was made of the sternest of stuff; when once he knew his duty, he would perform it, regardless of con-

Only for a moment was there anything ike indecision on his part. "I must see Mr. Frone about this matter, and to-night_now," he muttered, drawing a sheet of paper toward him, and dipping a pen in the inkstand. "Late though it is, he must come hereeven if he has gone to bed!"

He wrote rapidly, and in a moment had dashed off a few lines. Folding and directing the sheet, he arose and rang a small bell that lay upo

In a few moments a mill man rapped and opened the door. It was one of the sub-overseers of the floor. "Send a boy-one belonging to the

The lad took the letter and hurried away, buttoning his jacket as he went. "Philip Frone must explain this matter or-or he must lie to me," ejaculated young Gray, sinking into a chair and leaning his cheek upon his hand. "But can this matter be satisfactorily explained? Can it be explained at all, without bare-faced falsehood? I am pretty well convinced that my prospective father-inlaw is a rascal. That leads me to think-"I couldn't get here any sooner, Mr. to propound very seriously to myself, a very serious question. That question is

His mutterings died away and were lost in the dinning buzz of the mill. "That question is," he resumed, after a moment's pause, and in a louder voicea very decided voice--"do I love Leonora Frone? Let me also ask myself the question: Can I forget Maggie Marsh?" *Up and down the room he strode. His said, drawing a small leather book from brow grew black and clear by turns. His hands, locked behind him, gripped one another in a nervous grasp.

Nearly an hour passed. Suddenly the office door opened, and old Philip Frone, his face wearing a scared, startled look, strode into the room. CHAPTER VIII.
