A BUTTERFLY'S SOUL. rough the field where the brown quali over the ferns where the rabbits lie,

FREDERICTON, N. B., THURSDAY, JULY 11, 1889.

Saved by the Irish.

"I paid a visit to Ireland a few years ago," remarked Judge Noonan, of the Planters' house newsstand, "and infooing up through Galway I had to make use of a jaunting car. The driver, a thorough specimen of the peasantry, full of native wit and shrewdness, had in some way discovered that I was from America and after eying me keenly for a time, asked: 'It's from America yez are.'

"I acknowledged that such was the case, and after a short silence, he asked again: 'How are the Oirish gettin' along over thaire!'

"Bad,' said I. 'very bad. They are

A Transition or a Craze?

It is not so much a condescension of society to literature and art, in the persons of those who produce both, may be sources of amusement, or perhaps, to be just, of the enlargement of the horizon and the improvement of the horizon and the improvement of the mind. The society mind was never before so hospitable to new ideas and new sensations. Charities, boards of managers, missions, hospitals, newsrooms, and lodging houses for the illiterate and the homeless—these are not sufficient, even with balls, dancing classes and teas, of the superfluous energies of this restless, improving generation; there must be also radical clubs, reading classes, study classes, ethical, historical, scientific, literary, lectures, the reading of papers by ladies of distinction and gentlemen of special attainments—an unremitting pursuit of culture and information. Curiosity is awake. The extreme of social refinement and a mild Bohemianism almost touch. It passes beyond the affectation of knowing persons who write books and write for the press, artists in paint and artists in music.—Charles Dudley Warner in Harper's Magazine.

It was, of course, the admirable story, "The Luck of Roaring Camp," that first won fame on both sides of the Atlantic for Mr. Bret Harte, made his fortune, and showed that a great writer had arisen; but the story was not suffered to appear without a protest. Readers knew that there is no purer writer than this delightful novelist, who has never penned a line that the severest moralist would blot; but when "The Luck of Roaring Camp" was put into type the young woman who was proof reader in the office of the magazine found something in it which shocked her dreadfully.

Mr. Bret Harte was editor of the magazine for which he wrote the story (I am not absolutely certain of the name, and as this anecdote has, I believe, never been published, I must magazine for which he wrote the story (I am not absolutely certain of the name, and as this anecdote has, I believe, never been published, I must not make a mistake in a bit of literary history). He had just been appointed, and this was one of his earliest contributions, if not actually the first.

The proprietor and publisher of the magazine was a long way from being a man of letters, but to him the gentle proof reader appealed. She could not very well protest to the editor and author, so she went to the owner and told him what a dreadful story Mr. Bret Harte had written; indeed, she felt it impossible to retain her place if so shocking a writer was going to keep on with this sort of thing—dull, vulgar, stupid and ohl so improper. The proprietor read it, and, having no opinion of his own, went to the editor and told him how he had wounded the modesty of the proof reader; to which Mr. Bret Harte replied he was very was wicked or immoral. If it were an improper story, he added, his insbility to see it in that light showed that he was unfit to edit a magazine by reason of his lack of perception, and if he stayed he must insist on publishing the story.

The proprietor did not know whether to accept his resignation or not, but in the end the story was published, even at the risk—with, indeed, the certainty of hurting the feeling of the young woman who read the proofs.

The result amazed that publisher very much indeed. The edition was snapped up at once and other editions as fast ast they could be printed. Every BUTTER DELICATION AND COST LAIM TO GOLDEN BOTTOM.
