There was hardly a house but contained a victim of the fever. The authorities have given the work of burying the dead to a pack of hired Indians who went from house to house carrying the bodies of those they supposed dead or dying. The bodies were buried so rapidly that mistakes occurred. Many were put under ground while living. This is due to the disease which, at the favorable turning point, leaves the patient in a comatose state, which was mistaken by the Indian undertakers as death. The city is panic stricken. Merehants have closed their stores and nailed the doors. The restaurants are all closed. No assistance is obtainable. It is reported that the fever is ravages are more frightful than at Guyamas.
