BY C. SWAIN. why tremblest thou, Aspen? No storm threatens nigh;
Not a cloud mars the peace of the love beaming sky.

The the spring of thy being—no autumn is mear Thy green boughs to wither, thy sweet leaves The scar;
The sun, like a crown, o'er thy young head shines free,
Then wherefore thus troubled? What fearest thou, fair tree?"

I have watched through the mildest, the athlest of hours, when nature slept soft on her pillow of flowers, when, though all things appeared 'neath her influence blest, thou alone wert disturbed, thou alone couldst mot rest! not rest! gut till, as lamenting some dreadful decree, gut till, as lamenting some dreadful decree, Thou groamest in the calm like an outcast, lone tree.

A volce from its leaves seemed to wait on mine ear; a List, mortal! attend the dark source of my Abi learn the dread hour whon we sank neath rebuke.

And our to ughs, as if grapsed by a hurricane, shook;
What the morn rose in blood, when the dead wept around.

And a curse 'gainst our seed burst in woe from the ground!

The Cross, amidst lightning on Calvary stained. e from our roots; there His Blood was made from our roots; there His Binod hath remained?

Creation, accursing in misery spoke,
And a shadder eternal then first o'er us broke.
From the serpent we'er named, the last domest to betray;
Oh! no rest for the Aspen, till earth fades away?
