

likely to find ourselves in a minority opposed to proposals which to us are profoundly distasteful. There will be a strong temptation to leave the U.N. to flounder and to turn our attention to other avenues which look more promising.

44. I believe that this would be a serious mistake. The United Nations did not create the international problems of today and tomorrow; on the contrary, if it were suddenly to be erased the difficulties which beset the world, like dragons' teeth would multiply uncontrollably. The U.N. with all its weaknesses and faults represents our best hope for an accommodation between East and West; developed and Under-developed. Here lies the road to a better world - this is the route we must take.
