A submarine sled has been invented in Germany for the use of divers. It is driven by compressed air or oxygen. It does away with the use of the tube which ordinarily connects the diver with the outer air, and it also permits perfect freedom of motion, so that he is able to examine, in a given time, a far larger area of the sea bottom than was formerly the case. The submarine sled is taken out by a boat to the desired locality and then descends by means of its vertical rudder or by alteration of the air-pressure in its tanks. There is telephonic connection between the diver on the sled and an observer or signal-man, in the boat, who is thus able to direct the former's movements advantageously.
