Their plan was to pass the Tereek, to plander some merchants who were going to Mosdok. Ivan accepted without hesitation. For a long time he had wished to procure himself some arms; and they promised him, besides, a share of the spoils. He thought, also, that on seeing him return to his master, those who suspected him of wishing to desert, would no longer have any grounds to justify their suspicions. However, the major having strongly opposed his joining the party, he pretended to have given up the thoughts of it, when, one morning, for the world him that his father was resolved to kill him; and as he was returning, absorb-

The confidence of the Tchetchenges ought to have created suspicion in Ivan's mind. It was not natural in men, so cautious and so cunning, to admit so freely a Russian, their prisoner, in an expedition directed against his own country people. It was, indeed, found out some time afterwards, that they had invited him to accompany them that they had invited him to accompany them and with the sole intention of murdering him. As his quality of a convert obliged them to some sort of regard, they had proposed to keep a good look out upon him on the road, and to make away with him at the moment of the attack, leaving it to be supposed that he had perished in the fight. Only a few members of the party were in the secret; but
