

The Shrews Cup.

"Of course they don't want me," said Rosabel Raymond, sadly. "Nobody seems to want me. No home seems to be open to me—anywhere. When papa died he told me that 'Polo Dallas would be kind to me and make his small place. And he is kind, after his odd, abrupt fashion. But my Aunt Alice don't care for me, and the girls looked coldly on my shabby dress and pale, worn face. Evidently I am not a cousin to be proud of. If I were a haughty thing I would be very different." "Poor little Rosabel!" The world looked very dark to her as she sat on the window-sill of the thirdesty-back room in the Dallas mansion, which had been unanimously voted "good enough for Rosabel Raymond," and watched the fall colors and gales of the winter sunset fading out behind the crowding spires of the city.

"We were thinking, mamma and I, said Medora, "that you must be terribly dull without anything to do all these dreary days." "It is rather lonesome," sighed Rosabel, "pondering at her cousin's unusual thoughts." "And so, added de rosa, with the sweet smile that Rosabel always mistook, "when Miss Armitage told me of the place in the chrysanthemum and flower-decked rooms—you always were an artist, you know, my dear—would you like to go to the country with me?" "The very idea for Rosabel! You see Miss Armitage's protégée—Helen Havermont—has gone to Rome to prosecute her art studies, and there is a vacancy. And the salary would be something of an object, of course, because—"Of course it would be an object," said Rosabel, quickly. "You do not suppose that I do not feel my dependence here?" "And," nodded Medora, "thinking it best not to notice this course," Miss Armitage says you can obtain excellent board for four dollars a week with a widow lady and her room, and that would save you a lot of time and no end of fuss. So if you conclude to accept the position, perhaps you had better come down into the drawing-room and see Miss Armitage."

If there was anything which Rosabel Raymond loved it was her pencil. Water colors were expensive and drawing-board paper dear, and Aunt Alice thought it very unbecoming for a woman to see an oval easel and palette, full of all colors, "like a child," so had her table-drawer had since her residence in her home. Here at last was the much-longed-for opportunity, and she rose with alacrity and followed Medora Dallas down the stairs.

Mrs. Dallas and the Misses Dallas were openly ecstatic when Rosabel Raymond was gone. So dispiriting to have her around all the time, with her swollen eyelids and pale face," said Miss August.

"And so shabby as she looked too!" said Mrs. Dallas. And how can she go to Paris with a wardrobe, when papa made such a dreadful fuss over every dress that came home from Madame Fiebles' for her own girls?" "Of all things for me, Rosabel," said Medora, "that is the most intolerable," said Medora, spitefully.

priceless cups off the carved shelf of the Japanese cabinet and broke it into three pieces.

"Mrs. Whitworth Walkingham will commit suicide," cried Medora, clapping her hands with simulated terror. "I swear you to eternal secrecy!" said Mr. Ballard, laughing, as he wrapped the precious pieces in his pocket-handkerchief and disposed them safely in his pocket. "If they go to a store in New York, Brooklyn, or Jersey City where this precious pot can be matched it shall not be left us arched."

For every one, Mr. Ballard included, knew that Mrs. Whitworth Walkingham was almost a monomaniac on the subject of her china; and he was really more deeply chagrined than he appeared to be.

"You can't match it," said Medora Dallas.

And she proved to be right.

In his despair Hugh Ballard went to old Mrs. Megarosa, who was exactly what everybody's fairy godmother would be.

"What am I to do?" said he blankly.

"Do I said Mrs. Megarosa, nodding the diamond butterfly on her cap. Why, go to the china-painter and decorating rooms, of course, in Hammsley Square. Take your sample and you'll duplicate it for you in twenty-four hours. Say that Mrs. Megarosa sent you."

Mr. Ballard devoutly thanked the old lady and obeyed without loss of time.

It was a huge, airy room, with the windows all gilded with winter sunshine, and a soft steam-heat modifying the rigor of the February air, where half a dozen young women were working at a large table.

The beginning of its manufacture until now a single ounce of any but pure Virginia leaf is considered as high as has been used in the "Myrtle Navy" tobacco. The manufacturer of it has a settled belief that the public cannot be misled on this point, and that any tampering with the quality of the tobacco would be a monetary loss to them.
