A GIRL IN A THOUSAND

"You see, I—that is, the circumstances —on, yet, m'sieu', the trunk really was yours, since I have found mine on board, and, of course, claiming to be a gentleman, I wished to apologize for my rude behavior at the time," said Count Rudolf, with a sneer upon his face.

"Oh! that's all right; apology's accepted, only I beg of you, don't do it again. And, by the way, my dear count, I have wanted to have a little chat; why not now, since we have the deck pretty much to ourselves?"

"The penalty of greatness, my boy. Still, you have no cause to worry like that."

"Tell me why not."

"In the first place, so long as they believe you may carry their precious idol's eye on your person, no man among them would have the neve to drop you over

"I understand you are annoying a young lady who is a relative of mine, and has placed herself under my protec-

The count jumped almost a foot.
"Sare," he exclaimed, "she a relative of yours! It is quite impossible."

"Not at all; I'm her brother, you know, adopted brother. Ask her and be convinced. And, between you and me, in the course of time, I hope to assume even a closer relationship to Miss Moore."

The wretched count was certainly in a far from enviable condition: he could

"That suits me, provided you play a square game, count. No more schemes to win the lady's gratitude; if her life is to win the lady's gratitude; if her life is put in jeopardy again under such conditions, it will not be well for the geoundrel who is to blame. A fair field and no favor strikes an American as the right thing every time. Win her fairly, and, hang it, I'd be the first to congratulate you. I swear it. But no fighting under cover, no underhanded business, count, or I won't be answerable for the consequences. You found your trunk, you say'f good-naturedly.

"Ah, yes, but good-night, M'sieu' King.
I believe the sea is rougher than I expected. Really, I must—excuse me—another—" And then he went to the rail to look yearningly in the distance, perchance to discover the lights of Calais dimly permeating the gloom ahead.

Rex turned from the sad spectacle, for a man in the throes of mal de mer loses both caste and dignity, and it was more than ever a positive thing that Count Rudolf would be in no condtion for advancing his cause while he remained aboard the Channel steam packet.

To Rex it was available.

particular.

Deep in thought, Rex briskly paced the deck, and while he walked with the lights of Calais ahead, he saw Bridgewater approaching with quick steps, like a man who has exciting news.

CHAPTER XXVI.

"Looked for you all over the boat—had a half idea that blarsted count had watched his opportunity and fed you to the fishes." Bridgewater ejaculated, upon clutching the arm of the American and falling into step with his promenade made.

"Well, I gave him the chance, but he politely declined, although I swore this hurricane deck, deserted as it was, would answer all purposes, and I had the tools i mmy bag below. I'm very much afraid the count doesn't fancy the American method of giving satisfaction. You've been and loaded him down with such ghastly varus of my eccentricities. such ghastly yarns of my eccentricities out west, that he sees a horrible pitfall out west, that he sees a horrible pitfall in every modest proposal on my part."

Bridge looked up at the quizzical face of his companion as seen in the light of the lantern near by, and gurgled:
"By Jove! now, it's as good as a play, d'ye know! All the elements in hand, too. I thought he took my ghost stories rather seriously, but then I've seen and heard about some remarkable affairs in your wild and woolly west, and if I unconsciously drew the long bow in retailing them, what's the oods. But let that pass. I wanted to see you desperately."
"So I judged. Has the vessel sprung a leak? Will I have to swim ashore, after all? That was one of the things!

I proposed to our friend, the count, but the didn't seem to fancy it a bit."
"Rex, your a—a—corker; bless me, if I thought it was in you to bait a daredevil of an Austrian duelist like that.
No, the steamer isn't sinking, but she carries a passenger we never dreamed of of seeing again, and who may sooner or

"Now, who the deuter of the things."

"Now, who the deuce do you mean?" "Knew you couldn't guess; was sur-prised to see him myself. Who but Treage, he can give you a chase for your money."

"Look here, you don't imagine Madge cares fo. him, do you?" nervously.

"Well, he's a fine chap, Tremaine is, made of sterling stuff. They've angled for him these many years, and now that he's fallen in love with the little American, I expect it will prove a serious case. Of course, you've got the inside track now, but I honestly believe only for your appearance on the scene she might have appealed to Tremaine in time of trouble, and he'd have lashed her enemies like the old fighting had he is. Then—but what's the use of speculating how her respect might grow into a warmer feeling Tremaine is a fine fellow, I give you my word, and, next to you, I'd like to see him win out."

"Ah! thanks awfully. I was in luck, then, to happen on the spot when she needed help."

"You owe the count something for that"

Bridge drew a breath of absolute relief.

lief.

"Ah! you make me feel so much better when you say that. Twice to-night I've felt myseif being touched when in a crowd—a hand pressed against my person here and there, as if in search of something, and I tell you it's a very disagreeable experience. What if that hand held one of their infernal knives? I'll be a happy man when I've delivered that gem to the rajah, and receive his reward."

As the vessel neared Calais and drew

As the vessel neared Calais and drew into calmer water, the tortured ones came out of their agonized condition, and a mighty stir began to proclaim their readiness to leave the vessel. People pushed here and there, gathering parcels and forming into groups. Presently Rex discovered the one for whom he searched, and it rejoiced his heart to see that, so far as appearances went, Miss Moore showed no signs of having been sick; just why this should please him he could hardly have explained, save that he had an ardent hope they would be upon the water together many times when the land of the lotus caters was reached, and that it must be aters was reached, and that it must be keen delight to cruise indefinitely ith one who had no terror of the sea He was soon at her side, and appeared

He was soon at her side, and appeared to be as much at home as though he had a divine commission to especially look after Miss Madge's comfort.

What though the spinster frowned, and the count gnawed his military mustache in vexation, Rex was utterly impervious to all rebuffs so long as he felt sure he was wanted by the object of his regard.

felt sure he was wanted by the object of his regard.

So it was the American who carried her little parcels, and to whose arm the charming Miss Moore clung upon landing from the steamer.

Formalities were soon over, and they found themselves at liberty to enter the train that stood waiting to conduct them to the French capital.

Then up came Tremaine.

Rex watched when the other was bending over the hand which Miss Moore eagerly extended; it was his desire to read the truth, no matter if it proved painful to him.

She was glad to see Lord Duffield—

painful to him.

She was glad to see Lord Duffield—only that and nothing more—he was a good friend, in her estimation; the coming of Rex had prevented him from ever reaching a higher step; there was no constraint, no blushes, as when she met our Rex.

And that worthy heaved a sigh of relief as he muttered to himself:

"Sorry for you, milord, but the truth is you were never in the race at all. And sooner or later you're bound to get a bitter dose of medicine."

The prospect was exhilarating, and he could afford to feel kindly toward every-

Perhaps that was why he suddenly re-membered Bridgewater and his checker-ed plans; Bridgewater, whose lines had not been cast in as pleasant plases as his own, and whose dream of empire ecessitated a rough experience ere the rize could be won.

Would those shrewd agents from India Would those shrewd agents from India yet succeed in outwitting the little diplomat? He knew it must be always a question of opportunity with such unscrupulous chaps, and not moral obligations, for could they but secure the thing they sought, a score of human fives would count for naught in their Eastern religion; so that with poor Brid Eastern religion; so that with poor Brid Eastern religion; so that with poor Bridge it must be a case of eternal vigi-Bridge it must be a case of eternal vigilance the price of liberty, since innumerable chances might crop up between Calais and Calcutta, whereby the robbery could be effected, provided his wit was unequal to the cunning of his sagacious

So Rex began sauntering along the platform, taking a cursory glance in at each compartment, looking for the cheery and lightsome countenance of his friend.

Some one peeped out and watched his movements with more or less curiosity; some one who, with a feeling akin to dismay, saw a shapely hand and arm beckon the American to the door of a compartment down the line; some one who had an interest in his well-being, to judge from the feminine sight that ac-

Of course, it was Nance who beckoned. Rex found her evidently disturbed. Some others occupied the section with herself and the Abyssinian, much to the discomfiture of the general, who had forgotten to bribe the guard with a generous tip; but Rex saw nothing of Bridgewater among them. A dark-faced gentleman dropped his eyes when he found Rex looking at him, and the latter was of the opinion he had had such a party pointed out to him as one of the immortal seven.

Nancy laid her hand on his arm.

"Do you know where he is?" she asked, and, somehow, Rex saw no reason to question whom she meant— to her there was only one person worth designating as "he."

"Bless you, the last I saw of him was as we came off the steamer," he replied, beginning to share her uneasiness, for even though one of the dark-featured gentlemen were safely lodged in the carriage with them, where he could be kept under observation, there must be half a dozen more of the same dangerous breed at large, and capable of doing in-

"He had dropped his canes just back a little way—we could see them, and he bade us hasten in so as to get seats, promising to join us at once."

"That was how long ago?"

"More than three minutes—more than enough time for him to go and return."

Rex looked down toward the entrance and exit with some degree of eagerness.

Could they possibly have abducted Bridgewater under such conditions? Why these men were in an utterly strange city, and had but just now recovered from a severe attack of seasickness, that might be expected to disturb their thinking department. The diplomat had declared their equal would be hard to find when it came to daring and ingenuity, and Rex was beginning to believe it.

"I hope nothing has happened," he said, in a low tone, not being desirous of advertising his ideas to the outside world, and especially when one of the enemy was, as he believed, within hearing: "the train does not start immediately—I shall run heak and see what determents.
