Marshall Bros

The Most Dangerous Sport.

By RUTH CAMERON.

RUTH CAMERON

There is reason in all things. Or should be. And I do not see why the motorist should be any exception to the rule. But apparently he does. The other day I attempted to do a very revolutionary thing. I attempted to take a walk. The only road I could take to my destination was one frequented much by motorists. There were no side walks but we—there were two of us—walked just as close to the edge of the road as we could get without walking in the ditch.

Moreover, it was not a narrow road. There was plenty of room for both motorists and pedestrians. And yet again and again machines came up behind and went so close to me that they all but grazed my arm. The slightest deviation on their part or mine would have meant death or mutilation for me—as a punishment, I presume, for my daring to use the public highway for walking.

Just Too Much Bother To Turn.

Some motorist, I know, will point out to me that the machines that almost grazed me were probably passing other machines and needed more of the road. That was not so. When such contingencies happened, I stepped into the ditch and gave them the whole road. The cases of which I speak were simply cases in which the motorist would not bother to swerve from the very middle of the road, simply because it was too much bother for him to swerve and there were no nuts.

Now I am not writing out of a bitterness against machines. I like them—in their place. But I don't think the whole world is their place. I do not condone the Carelessness of Walkers.

Nor am I blind to the other side of the argument. I do not condone the fool pedestrian who walks in the middle of the road, or goes half way across a street and suddenly decides to turn back, or who does any of those other unnecessary and confusing and dangerous things. I wrote on that side of the question, and I do not withdraw what I said.

What I want is to see justice and decency and due consideration for the rights of others, both in the machine and on the street.

Like Railway Trains On The Open Street.

Twenty-five years ago if we had been told that machines equivalent in speed to a railroad train would be permitted to rush almost unrestricted about our public highways, that they would be driven by drivers of whom nothing like an engineer's experience would be required, and sometimes by young boys and girls and even by children, we certainly should not have believed it.

If in the next twenty-five years we see as great a development of the right of the motorist to own the earth, walking will become the most dangerous of outdoor sports. Going on a walking trip will be as serious an undertaking as climbing the Matterhorn, and parents will warn their daughters against walking on the public highway as they used to warn them against going out in canoes.

The Beginning Farmerette. "It's so difficult, Mr. Farmer, to milk a cow! Won't you let me begin with a calf?"

Blast It! Some people still believe it possible to get an idea into the head of a Hun. Yes, one might—dynamite!

Unquestionably. Millicent: What do you call him—the man who directs the staging of the play?

Fanny: "Why, stage coach, of course."

Keenly Original. Editor: Is Spiffins original in his literary work?

Sub-editor: Original? I should say so. He has written a war song without rhyming "Hun" with "run."

This Amazing War! Word reaches us from London that it is now passe to say "fapper" to denote that sweet young thing whom we shall always have with us, we suppose. To be in the mode one should say "spanner."

And just as we were getting so we could say "fapper" without flushing up and betraying a self-consciousness.

THE SINS OF THE FATHERS.

The sins of the fathers from year to year. Shall visit the children. So runs the law. Men's blood remains when the soul withdraws. Men's debts remain till the books are clear.

And the child must pay for his father's debts. And bear the shame of his broken creeds.

Bitter the path for the German child That shows his face the world in the years to be.

"Why do the neighbors turn from me?"

He shall ask his mother, "Am I defiled?"

And she shall answer, "You're not to blame. But you are stamped with your father's shame."

"Time was that honor was ours to know. And we were a people the world admired. But the soul of our Kaiser with lust was fired."

And he blundered us all to the depths of woe. And for five long years, to our lasting shame.

We slaughtered the innocent in his name.

"To do his bidding, our men forgot In their hours of passion that they were men. They prayed on the helpless as brutes again."

In the name of Kultur were women shot. And countless people were drowned at sea. For a Kaiser's dream that could never be.

"Oh, boy! you must suffer and not complain. Though you wear the badge of your father's sin. The faith that was lost is now yours to win."

The cast-off honor you must regain. You must wear, till men find that your word is true. The shame that your father have placed on you."

Milady's Boudoir

The beauty blemish of a shrill voice is a common one. Europeans tell us that the shrill voice of the American woman is an ever-present introduction; you know whenever you hear her, and you hear her from afar. She is positively megaphonic. When we travel on the other side this truth is brought to us. We observe the difference ourselves, and are ashamed.

The soft voice is not far-carrying. Invariably the shrill voice is the voice that is badly pitched. A reform is easy. It is not a beauty defect that is there, stationary, like a wart on one's nose or a wen on one's head. It is something that we can banish with a thought. But we have so little time to think.

A dozen reasons have been advanced for the American woman's unlamented voice; the climate's effect upon the vocal organs, an inheritance from the Puritans who exorted in a whining, sing-song voice, the natural Yankee twang of New England. These are not the reasons; the true one is found in the hurry and excitement of our hurried existence. The high pitched voice is evidence of thoughtlessness and nerve tension. In bettering these two conditions of mental sickness we shall find the cure.

The muscles which operate the vocal chords should have free and untrammelled play. We give them outrageous treatment, when we should be more considerate; it is only because they are endowed with tremendous resisting power and astonishing strength that they resist the abuse they receive. We shout and yell and talk with such energy it is almost a miracle that our voices last as long as the rest of us.

Music in Dairy Barns

ADDS TO MILK YIELD.

Phonographic music, occasionally supplemented by orchestra music, has become a regular milking-time feature in the dairy barn on a large stock farm in Ohio, according to the December Popular Mechanics Magazine. Commercial, rather than artistic, reasons have prompted the introduction of this feature, it having been found after repeated tests that the yield of the cows is greater when milked to the tune of some soft melodious selection.

On several occasions an orchestra has played for the cows with the same result, namely, an increase over the previous normal yield of milk.

TURKEY TIME.

WILL MASON

Thanksgiving Day is drawing nigh. We plan the bill of fare, discuss the juicy pumpkin pie, the turkey rich and rare. We have such cause for gratitude, for patriotic pride, we contemplate some oysters stewed, or, peradventure, fried.

The season bids us shake off gloom, let mirth and music flow; while in the Potsdam dining room the Kaiser's eating crow. The weary war will soon be done, its fires will cease to burn, and from their conquest of the Hun our soldiers will return; and waiting mothers will embrace the sons they've missed so long; and sweethearts meeting face to face, will sing love's old sweet song. We'll celebrate the war lord's doom with all the curves we know, while in the Potsdam dining room the Kaiser's eating crow. The Kaiser's eating crow, my boys, and so is Elitel Fritz, and Kronprinz Friedrich makes a noise like one who's throwing fits; there is no key on the board, a crow is all that's there; the Kaiser carves it with his sword, and damns the bill of fare. The crow is but a scrawny dwarf, the slickest of things; and Hindenburg and Ludendorff will get the legs and wings. Oh, let our faces be ablaze, let Bill have all the woe, as he sits in his dining room, and wrestles with his crow.

Rod and Gun.

The November issue of Rod and Gun published by W. J. Taylor, Limited, Woodstock, Ont., is on the newsstands and is replete with good things for the sportsman reader and lover of outdoor life generally. "Canadian Game Trails" by Hubert Hutton, "The Moose Call," a story of two narrow escapes, by G. F. Hiltz, "Caracaras," the record of a unique experience in the winter wilds, by A. Studtzel, and "Humors of the Hunt" by George R. Belton, are some of the contributions to the story section of the magazine. Other articles follow and the usual departments are well maintained. An article on the making of moccasins is illustrated by F. V. Williams who is also the cover design artist. Guns and Ammunition contains the first instalment of "The National Matches at Camp Perry" by C. S. Landis. Rod and Gun Mechanics for Trappers is a page of illustrations, and supplements the department. Along the Trap Line which is continued in this issue.

A child 3 years old can safely eat ripe pears. When a finger becomes so swollen that a ring cannot be removed; dip the finger in ice-cold soap suds. When churning butter from cream that tastes a little sharp, put a pinch of baking soda in the churn. Remember that a little carelessness about the baby's food may result in a serious illness or worse. A coffee pot should not be of tin. Tannin acid acts on this metal and makes a poisonous compound.
