SELF-WILLED.

"I thought there would be some tennis this afternoon."

"Yes, oh yes," said Carrie, still with a reserved embarrassment.

"Isn't there any?" asked Willie Fairfold.

Carrie glanced at Lord Cecil. The tennis court faced his private apartments. He understood it in a moment.

"I hope Miss Carrie is going to answer in the affirmative," he said, "and that I may be permitted to make one in the game."

"Yes, there is," said Carrie. "Come early, Willie."

"Thanks," said the young farmer, rather sullenly, and he strode away.

Carrie sat for a moment, presumably to give Bobby a rest, then flicked the whip and drove on.

"I did not know that you knew Willie Fairfold," she said.

"I am ashamed to say that I quite forgot him," said Lord Cecil.

Not a word more was said until Bobby, suddenly remembering his corn, put on a spurt and bolted into the drive; where Philippa was standing staring at them, as Carrie declared afterward, as if they were the advance van of a traveling show; then Lord Cecil jumped down and held out his hand to assist the charioteer.

"I have to thank you for a very pleasant drive, Miss Carrie," he said.

But Carrie, beyond a short nod, vouchsafed no reply, and refusing his proffered hand, got out of the other side of the trap.

"I thought you went out to avoid Lord Neville, my child," said Philippa, with a fine smile, as she followed her into the house.

"Philippa!" retorted Carrie, facing her with flashing eyes and an elaborate hauteur, "don't be mean—it doesn't become you."

CHAPTER VIII.

Lord Cecil found luncheon laid for him in his own sitting-room, and for the first time a feeling of disappointment struck him. It would have been more cheerful, he thought, to have had it in the dining-room, with Miss Carrie; but as he remembered the curt way in which she had declined his assistance on alighting from the cart, he consoled himself with the reflection that if he had lunched with her he would perhaps have done so in silence, and so sat down to his solitary meal with resignation.

"Get me my flannels, will you, Yates?" he said.

Yates stared with respectful astonishment. It was a long time since his master had made a similar request.

"Your flannels, my Lord?"

"Yes," nodded Lord Cecil. "I'm going to play tennis."

Yates opened his eyes still wider.

"Begging your pardon, my lord, but do you think you are strong enough?" he ventured to remark.

Lord Cecil laughed.

"Yes, I think I am quite strong enough to play, Yates, but whether I am strong enough to win a game is another question. What a splendid grandmother you would have made. Yates," he added, "I wonder how long you will continue under the delusion that I am an invalid. If you had your way I imagine I should be only allowed to take the air in a bath-chair. Go and get the flannels ready, and be sharp about it. Stay; give me the wine before you go."

He ate his lunch with a novel sense of enjoyment; life suddenly seemed to have acquired a slight zest.

The incident of the morning had amused him; Miss Carrie interested him more strongly and strangely. The unexpected touch of kindness with which she had attempted to atone for her rudeness had surprised and rather touched him. He had put her down in his mind as an ill-tempered troublesome girl, lacking any trace of fine feeling; and he began to think he had done her an injustice. Then, as he thought over the embarrassment which had fallen upon her at the approach of Willie Fairfold, he felt curious to see what it meant.

Was the stalwart, handsome young farmer her lover? It was quite possible. A vague, the very vaguest sense of disappointment smote him at the thought, so vague that he was scarcely conscious of it. They would make a handsome pair, he thought. And he smiled as he felt a kind of pity for the young fellow. Miss Carrie would lead him anything but an easy life! And yet, with all her temper, how beautiful she had looked, her girlish face half shaded by the weather-worn hat! Lord Cecil recalled, as an artist might have done, every expression that had flitted over her face, or shone in her dark eyes, even the defiant, angry gathering together of the straight brows, and, as an artist, dwelt on them admiringly.

Yes; the young farmer would have a beautiful creature for a wife, that was certain.

Then he went up-stairs and put on his flannels and sauntered out on to the lawn; to find that Giles and Yates between them had put up the tennis net and laid down the tape; but there was no sign of the other players.

Lord Cecil sat down on a rustic seat and took up a book that he had left there in the morning; but he could not read. He found himself looking up toward the garden gate expectantly; and when a tall girlish figure appeared at the wicket, clad in a white frock, with a pale blue tennis apron, he sprung up with an alacrity which surprised Yates, who stood watching him at the window as if he expected that his beloved master might fall into a faint before the game began.

"Mr. Fairfold not come yet?" said Lord Cecil, relieving her of the tennis bats which she held in her hand, and glancing with artistic admiration at the plain white dress that set off every line of the lithe graceful form.

"Oh, yes," said Carrie. "But Philippa has got him fast in an argument as to the proper time to sow sunflowers. I was sorry for him, but I told him that I would wait outside. Philippa is great on all floricultural questions, as you will learn to your cost."

"And you?" he said, with a smile. "What are you great in?"

"Nothing," she said, simply. "I am the most ignorant and useless of all the creatures that walk the earth. I save you the trouble of making the discovery by frank confession. Oh, here they come. Well, Willie, is it best to sow your sunflowers in December——"

"Don't pay the slightest attention to her, Willie," said Philippa, calmly. "Lord Neville, I am afraid we are trespassing on your good nature!"

Lord Cecil smiled.

"If you knew how anxious I am to begin!" he said.

"You two gentlemen had better take sides."

"We'd better toss for partners," said Lord Cecil.

"It doesn't matter whether you toss or not," said Carrie, with bland decision. "I've promised to play with Willie."

This settled the question with charming rapidity, and Lord Cecil with a faint smile inclined his head, while a flush of pleasure and embarrassment glowed on Willie's face.

"Perhaps you have also decided which court you will take," said Philippa, resignedly.

"No, you can choose," said Carrie, coolly.

"We must be thankful for so much at any rate," laughed Lord Cecil. "Which shall it be, Miss Harrington?"

Philippa laughed and shrugged her shoulders, and marched to the sunniest, as a matter of course.

"The sun won't hurt my complexion," she said, candidly. "If you don't mind, Lord Cecil?"

"Not a bit," he said.

The game commenced.

"I hope we shall beat them," said Willie, in a confidential voice, but Carrie appeared too intent on the ball to pay any attention.

He waited a moment, then ventured again: "I thought you said Lord Neville was a boy," he said timidly.

"So he was, once," responded Carrie, calmly.

Willie flushed.

"You said a nice boy was coming. I suppose it was a joke," he said.

"I never joke!" retorted Carrie. "Joking, as the copy-books remarks, is vulgar and demoralizing."

Silence for a moment, as she returned a difficult ball served by Lord Cecil, then the infatuated Willie tried again.

"It was awfully kind of you to take me on your side, Carrie!" with a shy, ardent glance from the blue eyes.

No answer.

"—I shouldn't have enjoyed the game a bit if I had been playing against you."

"Isn't that rather complimentary to Philippa, whose partner you would have been?"

"You know what I mean. Why do you pretend to misunderstand me?"

"Oh, please be quiet! That's the second ball I have missed. I never can play and talk at the same time."

"I beg your pardon," he said humbly.

"If they will only be kind enough to quarrel, we will beat them easily," said Philippa; "and as they never meet without quarreling, the chances are in our favor."

Lord Cecil smiled.

Your sister seems rather—rather 'difficult,' as the French say," he remarked.

Philippa laughed frankly.

"Have you discovered that already?" she said. "Yes, Carrie is not the easiest person to get on with. You see she has had her own way ever since she was born, and that has been bad for her. How well you play, Lord Neville! Yes; we shall beat them!"

"They will beat us easily," said Carrie, with a flush of impatience. "Lord Neville playes better than the rest of us put together."

"I thought he was an invalid?" said Willie, eyeing Lord Cecil suspiciously as he returned a ball in a masterly fashion and scored. "I suppose that was a joke also!"

"Game!" called Philippa. "Carrie you are not in the best of form this afternoon, or we are too strong for you!"

"Philippa, do not vaunt yourself," retorted Carrie, catching a ball on her bat. "Willie and I have been simply playing with you, have we not, Willie? Now we are ready to be serious," and she pushed back her hat and looked across at them with a laughing defiance on her beautiful face that transfixed Lord Cecil for the moment, so that Philippa had to recall his attention.

"Play now, if you ever played in your life, Willie," said Carrie, with a flash of light in her eyes.

NEW ONTARIO.

A Trip to Sault Ste. Marie and Algoma District.

To the Editor of the ADVERTISER:

Having heard a good deal about this new country, and having a little spare time after the harvest, I determined to take a trip north, and accordingly took passage on the steamship Atlantic from Wiarton on Sept. 2 for Sault Ste. Marie. After sailing for two days among the beautiful islands of the Georgian Bay we arrived safely at the Sault on Monday evening, where we were met and most kindly entertained during our stay in the town by Mr. and Mrs. Hughes, formerly of Amabel. Mr. Hughes is now foreman on the mason work on the new ship canal now being built. The town is situated on a nice rising ground and has a very fine view of the river and of the surrounding country. It has a population of about 5,000 inhabitants and is lighted by electricity. There are many fine residences with beautiful gardens filled with flowers. There are also some very fine churches, which are well attended, and a very fine public school; also a separate school taught by the Christian Brothers. The new canal is the largest work of the kind in the Dominion, being 900 feet long and 60 feet wide. About 800 men are employed, and 91 horses. There is also a large water power canal being built, which is being completed this fall, and which will be of great service to the erection of factories of any kind requiring water power. Without doubt it will be the greatest water power in the world, having Lake Superior for a mill dam. After visiting every place of importance, including the Indian Industrial School, some three miles east of the town, I called on Mr. Fred Rodgers, barrister, etc., Sault Ste. Marie, the honorary secretary of the Algoma Land and Colonization Society, also on Mr. Wm. Turner, the crown land agent, Sault Ste. Marie, where I got every information in regard to free grant and other land, both on the north shore and St. Joseph Island, being a farmer and interested in the settlement, I concluded to visit the different townships around Sault Ste. Marie and judge for myself, including the fertile townships of Korah and Pennefather. I came to the conclusion there was a large amount of good farming land and room for thousands of settlers all around the neighborhood of the town and extending back fifteen miles. There is also a fine settlement at Goulais Bay and Goulais River, 20 to 25 miles northwest of the Sault. The roads are excellent, having been made by the Government, and are a great benefit to the settlers. There is also good land to be had all along the north shore, between Sault Ste. Marie and the Mississauga River, a distance of some 80 miles; also on the St. Joseph Island. I can highly recommend any of these places to intending settlers who wish to get a good home. The crops looked good; there is good communication by railroad and water to any part of Canada, and this new country is easily and quickly reached at small cost. I shall be glad to give any information in my power to anyone who writes me, to address below, or who calls upon me at lot 12, con. 9, Amabel county, Bruce. Hepworth station post-office.
