Volume of Shelley.

New York, Nov. 2.—The classic row between Patrick McCarthy, the aesthetic junk dealer, and his brother Jim, over the missing first edition of Shelley, which has been chronicled in police court epics for a twelvemonth, took the two sexagenarians to police cells again last evening. Patrick is 60 vears old, and he has a "big brother Jim," who is 67. Jim ran away to sea many, many years ago, and Patrick always spoke of him with awe and mystery. Accordingly he was delighted to receive a visit from long-lost Jim in October of last year, and when Jim had got through telling of forty years of sea-roving, Patrick took his turn, and recounted the commonplace tale of forty years in a junk shop at Houston spreet and Variok. Im was busted. Patrick ELECTION RETURN sea-roving, Patrick took his turn, and recounted the commonplace tale of forty years in a junk shop at Houston street and Varick. Jim was busted. Patrick ELECTION RETURNS. waved a majestic hand at the scrap heap as his accumulation of worldly goods, and Jim jogged a hornpipe in derision. "Not so," said Patrick. "I am wealthy.

See here."

He produced from a nondescript pile a musty volume. Jim roared. But when Patrick, with glistening eye and tender voice, told him that for twenty-five years he had treasured this volume. Jim openhe had treasured this volume, Jim open-ed his eyes and listened to the tale of the priceless value of a first edition of Shel-ley's "Original Poems, 1810." said

Jim was awestruck, and soon after departed.

The night that "Shelley" was stolen Patrick knew that no one but Jim had been in the shop, and he forgot his adjourned joy of forty years, and tearing his hair in desperation had long-lost Jim haled to Jefferson Market court.

The gray-haired brothers confronted each other a moment. Then Jim struck out, like a true sailor, with firsts and feet. So the police have got both of them prisoners, with the mystery of the missing first edition still unsolved.
