The complexion, says an old book, can boly be preserved in freshness, softness and beauty by cleanliness, regular exercise, temperance, a plain diet and pure air, and a cheerful temper. This has a certain sound of copy-book philosophy, or little on the order of the be virtuous-and-little on the order of the be virtuous-and-little on the order of advice, yet all soil looks dry. Then give enough to persons get into the habit of giving water daily, not taking into consideration the fact that in dull weather evaporation takes place slowly. If water is applied too frequently, the soil will be in danger of souring, and good plants cannot be grown in a sour soil. Watch your plants, and withhold water till the surface of the soil looks dry. Then give enough to persons get into the habit of giving water daily, not taking into consideration the fact that in dull weather evaporation takes place slowly. If perfect cleanliness existed, inside and out, there would be no such thing as bad skin. Water applied to the surface can never remove the chief factors that produce blem—ishes about the face. Perhaps it is not an exaggeration to say of almost every well-to-do woman thus disfigured, as of Ophelia:

Too much water hast thou! An excess and withhold water till the surface of the soil looks dry. Then give enough to permeate the entire ball of earth in the pot.

In winter never apply water that has not had the first chill taken off. I do not believe in giving warm water to ordinary plants, but I advise letting it stand until the soil about your plants at least once a week, to the depth of an inch. This for two reasons; it prevents the soil

'Too much water hast thou!' An excess of tubbing, with a scarcity of other bygitenic measures, is bound to produce an inferior article in the way of complexion.
The bath, as at present indulged in, is a great luxury; yet there can readily be two opinions in regard to its healthfulness.
Soaking in water at a pleasant temperature has its charms. The lazy drying that follows, and the lazy dressing afterwards are not without attractions. But who can asy the skin receives benefit from any such indolent self-indulgence? There are certain common forms of skin troubles that are greatly aggravated by water, especially cold water. This is true of ordinary eczema, an eruption characterized by red dened patches that may exnde some discharge, and thus become dry and scurfy, with itching and tingling. To one suffering from such annoyance, the best med ical advice is this: Do not wash, if you wish to be clean. Cleanse the lips and eyes with a soft wet cloth in the morning, but refrain from sousing or even moistening the scurry patches. At night apply to them, with the tip of the finger, the thin. ing the scurfy patches. At night apply to to go over it at least once a week, ing the scurfy patches. At hight apply to them, with the tip of the finger, the thinnest possible layer of zinc ointment.

Sometimes it is necessary to repeat this application in the morning. A well-chosen internal remedy will often hasten the cura. Another, kind of skin trouble.

Another kind of skin trouble At least once a week take your plants to called sone appears in various forms of the kitchen sink and give them a thorough called sone appears in various forms of what are known as pimples. When such a condition exists the face should be bathed at night only, with a piece of soft flannel and very hot water, the hotter the better. A lather of just the right kind of pot such a room for them at thorough showering. This applies, of course, to such plants as are kept in a room where a showering cannot be given daily. If you have a room expressly for them it will not be necessary to do do this. If you have not such a room for them make up your not such a room for them, make up your mind to have one as soon as possible. It
