

BOMBAY HARBOUR.

It is not true that all the natives of India are sheep; nevertheless, your first impression is that they are. The Hindu is ovine, the Briton is bovine, and it is not a not born with it on their lips, than English has in India. Surrounded constantly by far too obsequious and cringing Asiatics, the average British official in India does not wonder that the latter rules the former.

TRINCOMALEE HARBOUR.

Nowhere, except, perhaps, in the case of the Spanish in South America, has a language spread more rapidly through great populations suffer from a deficient sense of his own personal dignity. He is not eager to learn the dialects of his multitude of servants. They must, therefore, learn English.

The classical tongues of India,