soft voice, while the young couple wished each other a very long good night.

The next morning the old gentleman is the first awake in the house. He writes and seals, and puts a parcel in the pocket of his brown coat. He takes his hat and cane, and after a short walk knocks at the door of an old university friend, the notary Hillmann, who is also a gladsome bachelor, but for other reasons than his friend Secret. He thinks himself so ugly that every girl is frightened at the sight of him, not to speak of marriage.

Included, he has never been handsome, but it is by no means so bad as he, with the help of his mirror, believes. At the door of this stranger of all notaries, Mr. Secret knocks, and obeying a harsh "come in," seats himself in the client's chair, at the writing desk, to the great astonishment of Hillmann.

"Listen, old friend; I come to tell you that I am deceased!"

The notary thinks his friend deranged.—Speechless with astonishment, he looks at the man before him, and with so comical an expression on his face that Secret laughs aloud, and only after some time is able to continue:

"I am, then, deceased, and have deposited my will with you, which you must publish tomorrow, or the day after, to the person mentioned in it. Here is the will, sealed with seven seals, each representing a witness, as your annoying code of laws prescribes. You will add your name and seal. This note will tell you the name of the testator."

"But, interrupted the notary, 'how can you pass for deceased?' Your name?"

"Does not stand in the testament," replied Secret. "It is a feigned name."

"My friend, don't be offended, but the idea is very peculiar! Why not give the sum directly to the person?"

"Myself? No! But I might do it through a third person. However, you know that I like to do things secretly, and the most secret is such a will. I trust in your silence, not because you are my friend, but because you are a sworn notary."

"You will always be a funny fellow," answered the notary. "However, the matter is unobjectionable, and as it is a favor to you, so let it be."

The next day Caroline was truly terrified when the notary summoned her to his office; a fright was repeated in a higher degree when the testament was published which provided her with a nice little sum for her dower, on condition that next New Year she would be married to Thomas, the gardener. The will was signed: "From a cousin who loves you."

In vain Caroline's mother thought of all her relations. Cousins she had, but they were poor; and as far as she knew, not yet dead. She told the occurrence to Mr. Secret, who rejoiced very much, but could give her no explanation. He said that "the world was large, and one might not know in what secret corner the cousins were hidden."

He had the greatest pleasure at the wedding which was celebrated at the next New Year. Then, however, he became faithless to his general principles, for in his own person he presented the happy couple to their return from church with a richly bound Bible.

One morning he departed, without sickness. Suddenly he had been called "the dark visitor," whom he so much feared, must have approached him in his most friendly form, and spoken softly to him, for a peaceful smile was spread over the old bachelor's features. Among the papers of his deceased friend, the notary, Hillmann, found a second will, this time, signed with his true name. It appointed Thomas, the gardener, as heir to his little fortune.

A long time has passed since the death of Secret, and often has the New Year greeted the world. Thomas and his wife have grown old. But, as they always have done since the day of their marriage, so to-day they read from the Bible that their friend presented them on their wedding day, and bless the founder of their happy household, Mr. Secret, the Bachelor.

The celebrated singer, Henriette Sontag, began her career in Vienna. Everyone who knows anything about the boards that represent the theatrical world will readily believe that the young, amiable, and highly endowed artist had to struggle against envy; but her debut was a splendid one, in spite of the jealousy of her colleagues. However, she was kissed as passionately by the soaks of the side scenes as she was received with applause by the lions of the parterre. Miss Amalie Steininger was one of the most engaged of these snakes—a lady whose octave was reduced long ago by the storm of passion to a few hoarse notes. Nevertheless, Miss Amalie had her knights, who still always wore her colors, and fought for her beauty, and by aid of this knighthood she succeeded in putting her rival to flight.

Some years later Miss Sontag sang at one of the first theaters of Berlin, together with the celebrated tenor, Fogar, and triumphed over Signora Catalina. The tongues of the enthusiasts and the pens of the journalists talked only about her, and there was no garden in and around Berlin that had not been plundered in order to give her flowers. Her carriage was always surrounded by people of the first families; and some nights the people took the horses off and drew the carriage themselves. That was indeed enthusiasm! So, as before said, she was the Catalina of her time, with the exception that she was young and beautiful, while the former was remarkable for her ugliness.

On a very fine morning when Henriette Sontag was driving in one of the most fashionable streets of Berlin, surrounded by numerous riders, she heard the Viennese national song by a child's tender voice. The great singer made the carriage stop, and called the little singer.

"What is your name, my pretty little Viennese girl?" was her question, leaning on the door of the carriage.

"Nannerl!" was the answer, given in the Austrian dialect by the little one.

"Who is that woman you lead there?" continued Sontag.

"Oh, that's my poor blind mother, madam," replied the child.
