MARJORY MOORE.

"We are together, now, at any rate, said Marjory, leaning her head against his shoulder contentedly, "and I mind nothing else so long as I have you!"

Mariory's first surprise had certainly beer a great success. Her second was almost equal to it. She took Archie next morning to a pretty little house, half villa, half cottage, which she and Mrs. Hyde had been busy furnishing and decorating for the last few weeks. It was Felix's house, and he had let them have it rent free, Marjory explained, and had had it furnished at his own expense.

"We can have it for the winter, at any rate," Marjory said, looking somewhat anxiously into Archie's face, "and if, when you are quite strong, you hear of something else that you like to do, we can leave It Is Strongly Advocated by Dr. America to adjust their controversies it then. Felix says we are to feel under no obligation to stay any longer than suits us, but he thought that a quiet little home like this would suit us better, for a few months at least, than lodgings.'

"It is a jolly little place," said Archie, sinking down into one of the deep basket chairs, with an air of fatigue, which show ed how much the short walk from the Hall had tired him. "But what are we to live on in the meantime, I wonder? I am not exactly a man of independent means, and I have nothing to do at present. I am afraid I am not strong enough just yet to do much."

"No, of course you are not," said Marjory, caressingly, "and that is why Felix offered us the house, for there is a plece able to do it when you are better. This used to be the land agent's house, and Fellx thought that perhaps you wouldn't mind, when you felt quite well, able to work, doing some of the business thta the land agent used to do. He will explain it to you himself, but I was to ask you first whether you would mind accepting the post, unless, of course, anything turned up that you liked better. It is three hundred a year and the house.

"Mind!" said Archie, springing up with all his old vivacity, "I should think not. For a time, at least, as you say, Marjory. Why, it's just the place where I shall get well and strong again. You really have no idea how much I have gone through, and I daresay there won't be more work than I am able to do. Felix is a capital fellow, I must say that "

This period of quiet was not destined to windows of Marjory's quiet little home, the old nightmare horrors came upon him, groans and gaspe of terror broke from him. were stretched out to draw him down to the bottom of an abyss from which there was no escape. "I thought, Archie, that perhaps Felix could give you something to make you sleep better."

"I won't have Felix Hyde constantly appealed to," said Archie, angrily. "I have been subject to these dreams ever since I went to America. It is all nerves, Felix told me so, and they will go off of themselves by and by."

"But if they get worse, Archie?" "They won't get worse," said Archie. "If they did I should see a doctor about night, really bad. I mean, I have had since I came home, and I may never have an-

He had made her forget even the loss of her

Helen Drummond also came to see her, and proved herself a true and affectionate friend, but the two women never became exactly intimate. Perhaps there was always a little undefined resentment in Helen's gentle heart against Marjory for having caused so much suffering to her beloved Cousin Felix, who might once have been dearer than a cousin if fate had not willed it otherwise. Nevertheless, as there were few young women of Helen's age and position in the neighborhood, she fell back upon Marjory a good deal for sympathy and companionship; and Marjory was not surprised, therefore, when one evening she received a hurriedly written note from Miss Drummond asking her to come to the Rectory as soon as she possibly could, as there was a matter on which she wanted her help and advice.

Marjory responded instantly to the appeal. She put on her hat and went down to the Rectory at once, where she was received by Helen with a still, white face, which told her that some calamity must be near. A few words soon revealed what was wrong.

Of the Question Before the Saratoga Convention-Facts and Figures in Support of the Alliance.

Saratoga, N. Y., Aug. 31.-The folowing address on "The proposed Anglo-American alliance" was delivered before the American social science of work attached to it, Archie, if you feel association at its annual meeting in this city to-day by Charles A. Gardiner, A. M., Ph. D., counsel for the elevated railroads of New York city. Mr. Gardiner began his speech by pointing out the aggressive attitude of Russia in the far East, and citing the importance of an alliance between England and the United States, in order that their identical interests might be protected. Thousands of miles from their seat of government, on the other side of the globe, the two great Anglo-Saxon races have met face to face for the first time in history, for England has been in the Orient for a century and America now holds the Philippines. They establish the coro'lary, however, that if you curtail British territory or British influence, you necessarily curtail American comnerce. All that trade is now seriously menaced by Russia and her allies in the East. In the present anxious position of affairs, may we not greatly assist England, and incalculably benefit ourselves? What right have we to stand supinely by and let Great Britain fight our trade battles? Is it just? Is it becoming in a great naion? What, if unaided, Great Britain should fail? When the trade in-

Thus 63 per cent. of the shipment, sent as ordinary cargo, were six or seven samples anded in a damaged condition. The whole shipment was sold at an average price of 8s per barrel, which netted 75 cents per barrel in Western ontario. Evidently the wet and slack ondition of the apples when delivered from the steamship was due not to the kind of fruit or the manner of packing, but to the fact that they had een heated during transit, and were greatly damaged in consequence. It is, therefore, evident that for the carriage of early and soft apples, cold storage is necessary to ensure good ondition and reasonably good returns

The cold air should be conveyed to the bottoms of the holds, perhaps in a manner similar to air shafts for carrying cold air to the stokers: and fans should be used for sucking the warm air out. If these were used mainly during the night only, the holds could be kept sufficiently cold to land apples, entirely undamaged by their transit across the ocean.

Headache Powders Condemned.

From the London News. A word of warning has been issued with regard to the indiscriminate use of headache powders, to which so many people fly for relief during the dog days. In his quarterly report on the health of the Borough of Chorley, Lancashire, Dr. J. A. Harris, the medical officer for the district, calls attention to the sale and purchase of these remedies. He states that under his direction the county police obtained shops in the town and had them submitted to analysis. In every case the quantity of the active ingredient was ound to be in excess of the maximum dose of the drug allowed in the British Pharmacopeia. The subject brought up and discussed at the recent British Medical Congress at Edinburgh, and there was a general consensus of opinion that these drugs required to be handled with the greatest possible care, and that a slight error of judgment with regard to dose might be followed by disastrous re-
