Great Thinkers' Thoughts.

Riches, though they have great eagle's wings to fly away from us whilst we are here in this world, yet have not so much as little sparrow's wings to fly after us and to follow us when we go hence. We brought nothing into this world, neither shall we carry anything hence — S. J. Lacer.

Some men spend their lives in picking off dead leaves from the tree of their being. They think they are growing better, because they now and then take out their will, like a pruning knife, to cut off this and that bough. They imagine they are self-denying because they dust themselves over with unpleasant sulphur, but all the while they never go to the root, where the worm of selfishness is working.

— H. W. Beecher.

There is a place for anger as well as for love. We do not want fretful, passionate people, neither do we want unvarying softness. Let us have a man who loves good and hates evil. You may as well attempt to let light into your chamber without expelling the darkness, as to retain affection for the good without becoming a terror to the evil. You are cruel to your friend, and not kind, if by your softness you stimulate still farther the growth of a thorn, already choking the good seed in his heart. Give the devil that possesses your brother a blow, although your brother himself should feel the smart; when he comes to himself he will thank you. — Dr. Arnold.
