

upon the property of the Russians on whom he has bestowed them, that he may thereby prevent the possibility of the soil of Poland being ever in future possessed by its rightful owner; he is adopting the most unjustifiable and tyrannical measures to change the language, the religion, the habits, and the feelings of unfortunate Poles, whose liberties he has trampled under foot; and by compelling all the males, excepting one in each family, to serve in his armies, he is endeavouring to reduce the numbers and break the spirit of the people. But let the tyrant of the North beware. For a time he may unchecked, continue his present career of injustice and cruelty; but the day of retribution may yet arrive: the time may come when the nations of the west and of the south—their own liberties confirmed, and their domestic grievances removed—will be obliged to make common cause against the barbarians of the north, and to re-establish the ancient kingdom of Poland, as the bulwark and defence of civilized Europe, against the aggressions of the brutal hordes of the Calmuc oppressor.—Intelligencer.
