CHAPTER XIX. A'ORL' BYPLENCE, When Colonel Chester returned outh, the whole Bruce family accompanid him. He telegraphed to Floresce that also might expect him on Thursday, and that he should bring five friends with him. That young lady was indolently melining in a hammock, on one of the wide pleasant galleries, when Gipey, her little maid, brought the telegram to the stille maid, the unfolded it, and g'anced quickly at the message. And then it struck.— Exchange.

occe recognized Nina Bruce, whose luxuri-ast hair at hat moment adorned her own heal. Before Florence could speak, Colonel Chester had taken Nina's hand, and had led her directly under the portrait of her grandmother, taken in her childhood. " Tell me, Florence, "he cried, "do you see any resemblance between this picture and this young girl you have known as Nina Bruce?" " They are very much alike," she eaid. "Tell me, grandpapa, is Nina Bruce andy-thing to us? " Bhe is everything to us," he replied, tenderly. "She is the daughter of your Uncle Richard." " This accounts for the locket, then," said Florence. " Did you return it to her, grandpag?" " I did." " Mad L? asid Florence, with a flush on her fair, proud face, "have an apology to make to you, Mise"—be handsed, with a quick glance at Colonel Chester. " Nina Chester," Florence repeated, while the flush grew deeper, " will you forgive my seening rudences?" She congratulated herself that she had made a fine apology, and had fully stoned for her mistake. Nina stepped forward, and, lifting her awene young face, kissed Florence, saying: " Your mistake was only natural under the circumstances. Let us be frieade, Consin Florence." What is wrong with the hammook ?" "I reckoned yo' sot down on a centiped, yo got up so mighty quick," said Gipsy, ducking her wooly head, and darting wit great agility through the door way. "Tou had better have a care, or you will think you have beer, bitten by sdozen ocentipeds," said Mise Florence, as she went down sairs. On her way to the kitchen she met Aunt Dinab.

Nina stepped forward, and, lifting her-eweet young face, kissed Florence, saying : "Your mistake was ooly natural under the circumstances. Let us be fiteads. Consin Florence." Florence suffered Nina's carees, but did not return it. It was expending a hitle teo-much, she thought, that she was going to open the insermot portail of her heart to this girl, ignorant and uneducated, for aught she knew; that she was going to feel pleasure in the society of one who came to rob her of a part of her inheritance, and the greater part of her grandfathef's florence Obseter could not grant, as Nina Sould learry, if she remained among them. Colonel Chester then presented his grand-daughter to his other guests, and the summons to Jinner relieved the embar-nament causel by Florence's haughty condecension. <text><text><text><text><text><text><text><text><text><text><text><text><text><text><text><text><text><text><text><text><text><text><text><text>
