One counter-attack was repulsed by a handful of men in a way that gives a grotesque comedy to all this night scene of war, filled with so much death and 2 grotesque comedy to all this night scene of war, filled with so much death and terror, and human courage, strong in endurance. A tot of rum had been served out to each Canadian, to give the glow of warmth to limbs chilled in the wet soil of the shell craters, and to hearts chilled by the reaction which fol-lows fierce excitement. This handful of men were sitting in a German dugout; they were glad of that rum; it put new fire into their blood. "German counter-attacks? Bah!" after this dose of rum they were ready for the German army. They laughed and sang, forgetful of the scenes about them. It was as jolly as in a log cabin of the west by this dug-out, where corges lay very quiet." Again they shouted and laughed more loudly, giving Indian war cries and other wild whoops, and that was when the conter-attack began. It did not get very far. A body of Germans, advancing over No Man's Land to the British lines, suddenly heard the 'frightful blood-curdling sounds. It was as if the tribes of the Blackfeet had come out upon the war-nath veiling as they cannot the war-and to the state the tribes of the sume they cannot the war-nath veiling as they cannot the war-set they cannot the war-set veiling as they cannot the war-set veiling as they cannot the war-they connot the war-they c heard the frightful blood-curding sounds. It was as if the tribes of the Blackfeet had come out upon the war-path, yelling as they swung their toma-hawks and dancing round with scalps of their victims. The Germans hated to hear such noises; it was as if all the devils of hell were upon them, laughing diabolically. They turned and fied. That episode, which shook the shell craters with laughter, is not heroic, but belongs to the humors of war, with other adventures, which come lurching into the midst of horror like clowns in Shakespeare's tragedies. What is fine and noble is the way in which all the Ganadians have held on to their ground through the heavy rainstorms, which swamped them, and under the great shell fire re-solved to die rather than yield a yard of what they had won.
