Flour and Substitutes

STATEMENT BY THE FOOD CONTROL BOARD.

The Harbor Grace "Standard" in its last issue published a lengthy article respecting food control, with special reference to the matter of flour and substitutes. The Food Control Board thinks it desirable, as this article embodies points of criticism and comment very generally employed, to deal with it fully.

The "Standard" complains that white flour is difficult to obtain and that it is held by people who hoarded it. The answer is that until July last no call was made on the Food Control Board to require the use of substitutes, although standard flour was made universal in Canada in February. After that month none but standard flour was imported here and what white flour was in town was gradually bought, much of it being doubtless hoarded by unpatriotic people. In July the Canada Food Board, owing to a shortage, required us to employ substitutes with the standard flour, because this was the only quality in general use, and such a regulation had to be put into effect.

The "Standard" next complains that mixtures of standard flour and substitutes do not make good bread. The answer to this is that precisely the same flour is used in Canada with precisely the same quantity of substitutes. That some standard flours are not as good as others has to be admitted, but the same is true of the old time white flours. There is much apprehension in the public mind as to the difference between standard flour and the white flour formerly so general. The white flour contained about 72 per cent. of the wheat berry.

The standard flour, if milled according to the Canadian requirements, contains 76 per cent. or is only 4 per cent. coarser. Some standard flours are apparently milled about another 4 per cent. coarser, but even the latter flour is not as coarse as that in use in Britain to-day, which contains 83 per cent. of the wheat berry, and yet the flour has to be subsequently adulterated by an admixture of at least 20 per cent. of substitutes, and the British people are apparently not suffering in any fashion from the use of the bread and other articles made from the use of such flour.

The "Standard" suggests that cooking classes should be started in every settlement of any size during the coming winter. This is easier said than done. Last winter the Food Control Board promoted a bread baking contest in St. John's. The City contains some 30,000 people, or say 6,000 families. Out of these no more than 250 participated. With this example before them it is very questionable if, assuming that the Board could secure competent instructors for cooking classes, the attendance in the outposts would be such as to justify the expense which would be involved in such a policy.

The "Standard" then suggests that the Board give the ordinary household the option of buying less substitutes, but of making bread out of standard flour without any substitutes or with as little as she chose, provided she use the whole or what remains of the substitutes as household foods, say in the form of oatmeal or cornmeal porridge, or oatmeal or corn cakes. The best answer to this is found in a statement of Herbert Hoover, the American Food Controller, to a meeting of the Food Administration in the various States of the Union, at Washington on September 4th, 1918, when he said:—

"In providing a 'substitute' programme for wheat next year of twenty per cent. we wish to change the attitude of mind of the American public towards the policy of substitutes in that we wish to get this percentage of substitute grains into the actual wheat flour itself.

... What we desire to get into the minds of the householders is that they should get the twenty per cent. of substitutes and mix it with the flour for all purposes, and that any use of these substitutes for other purposes is not making a war bread and is not maintaining an economy in the consumption of wheat. We believe that it is patriotic and right for every person in the United States to eat the same flour during the next twelve months that is eaten by the whole of the Allied countries. ... All suggestions that mixed breads have any dietary damage inherent in them only raises a laugh in Europe. There bread has been mixed as high as 75 per cent. of other cereals for months during the past year and comprises everything from beans to potatoes, and they have had as yet no dietary difficulties, and the number of people who insisted that they must have white flour in order to exist through a stream of physicians' certificates has been reduced to such a small number that they have abolished these certificates altogether on the general basis that a person who is so particular as that during war times that they should die and disappear from public life. Therefore I have no patience with the people who wish to have a little white flour to make themselves a few special biscuits on Sundays."

Finally the "Standard" recommends that if there be enough standard flour available, no substitutes need be put with it, or that there may be enough standard flour to reduce the substitutes to one-eighth instead of double as much. The answer to this is that the Canada Food Board has undertaken to give this Colony its normal supply of wheat flour less 20 per cent. of substitutes so as to place the Colony on an equality with the rest of this continent. Last year there was a very large over-import of flour and we were specially notified that this would not be tolerated for the present twelve months. Under these circumstances our Food Control authorities have been endeavouring to induce people to play the patriotic part and purchase flour as sparingly as possible consistent with their actual needs, and if this policy is pursued and the substitutes are rightly used, there will be ample flour in the country to furnish as many loaves of bread as any other year, and thus feed as many people; but if certain elements amongst us persist in hoarding flour and not using substitutes in the proportion necessary, there may come a shortage during the winter which will necessitate the Food Control Board taking drastic measures, even to the removal of the excessive flour from the homes of hoarders in order that everybody may fare alike.

As Written.

The British Government department entrusted with the duty of disbursing separation allowances receives some strange requests from correspondents who put in a claim for them. These are a few examples culled from many: "I have received no pay since my husband has gone nowhere." "We have received yours truly—I am his Grandfather and Grandmother, he was born and brought up in this house in answer to yours truly." "My Bill has been put in charge of a spittoon, will I get any more money?" "I have received no pay since my husband was confined to a Constipation Camp in Germany." "I am paying attention to a nice young man—how do I go about money?" "In accordance with instructions on ring paper, I have given birth to twins enclosed in envelope."

The Prussian Spirit.

(From the Westminster Gazette.) A good many people last night were talking as if the war would now certainly end by Christmas, and there was a general feeling of triumph and jubilation everywhere. An enterprising newsboy who ran about outside the Guildhall crying "Surrender of Austria"—his geography was a little mixed—seemed to anticipate the news that the crowd expected. But it would be as well, if the public are not to be disappointed, that they should view the future in a more cautious spirit. Reports from the front show that the Germans, especially the Prussians, are putting up a very stiff fight, and we must expect them to do so for some time yet. The tradition of Frederick the Great, who fought against heavy odds, has a strong hold on the Prussians, and I recall a Prussian statesman saying many years ago that even if Prussia were deserted in a European war by Bavaria and Saxony she would continue to fight, for Prussia would never admit defeat while she had a man left. Four years of war have undoubtedly had an effect even on the Prussian spirit, but we must not bank on the war being over before Christmas.

Hard Salted Salmon.

Since last reports there has been a good movement in hard salted salmon in New York, small offerings being eagerly taken advantage of and local trading showing a general improvement. The supply of this grade in New York hands is not large at present, but the demand has improved to such an extent that there is now an inquiry from many sources which have heretofore taken little or no interest in it. Offerings from the Pacific Coast this week consisted largely of medium reds, which are reported to have been sold at $30.75. Seattle. Other offerings of pinks at $16.07 are reported, and it is understood that these have met with counter offers from the trade at slightly lower prices which have been rejected. According to well-informed sources there are still fair quantities of Alaska reds to be offered, and it is reported that factors on the Pacific will ask $22 for these. Champs up to $22.50 for salmon at this time, have been negatively offered at $14 per barrel. Halifax salmon has been little in demand since the sharp advance in price a fortnight ago. As packers in Newfoundland are asking MINARD'S LINIMENT PHYSICIANS.
