The Royal Marriage Market

"SHORT LIST" OF ELIGIBLE PARTIES—DIFFICULTIES DUE TO WAR AND RELIGION—PRINCESS JULIANA OF HOLLAND.

(BY ANTHONY CLYNE, in Liverpool Weekly Post).

The nation is always wondering whom and when the Prince of Wales will marry, and interest in royal matchmaking is heightened by the rumours that an "interesting announcement" concerning Prince Henry may be made at any moment. A third member of our Royal Family—Prince Henry—may choose to wed outside a royal house, but the tradition of royal marriage remains hardly affected in other countries, though the princes and princesses of the deposed dynasties of Russia, Germany and Austria are no longer eligible partners as they were before the war for the unmarried members of reigning houses. The three great families—the Romanovs, the Hohenzollerns, and Hapsburgs—have been for long the principal sources of supply, so to speak, of the royal marriage market, and without them the choice is restricted to the point of anxious embarrassment.

Especially so, for example, is the case of Princess Juliana of Holland. She belongs to a Protestant house, and of old Germany provided an ample selection of mates for Protestant princes and princesses, as Austria for Catholic. Now, apart from Britain, only Denmark, Sweden, and Norway can furnish suitable candidates—Crown Prince Frederick of Denmark and his brother, Prince Knud, the Princesses Marina and Astrid of Sweden, niece of King Gustavus, and Crown Prince Olaf of Norway; not yet of an age for marriage. The case of Princess Juliana, a properly plump and plaid Dutch girl, is indeed a hard one. True, there are attractions apart from Juliana's charms. The House of Orange-Nassau is an ancient one, with a glorious past, one to which the most exalted family would feel proud to be allied. Holland, too, is a prosperous, happy country, secure from political currents likely to disturb the court. But the fair Juliana will one day reign as monarch in her own right, and the post of Prince Consort is apt to be a thankless, trying, uncomfortable one. Yet to elevate one of her own subjects to a place beside her would produce grave difficulties and possibly dangers.

Thrown Tradition To The Winds.
Two Danish princes, Erik and Viggo, have boldly thrown tradition to the winds, and not long ago married respectively Miss Booth of Ottawa, and Miss Green of New York. Neither of these was a morganatic marriage, for the consent of the sovereign had been obtained. A morganatic marriage is perfectly legal and binding and does not, contrary to the popular notion, involve social disgrace or moral dishonour. It merely implies a recognition of the difference in rank between the two contracting parties, together with the provision that the offspring of the union do not inherit the higher social status. The marriage of the Archduke Francis Ferdinand, heir to the Imperial throne of Austria-Hungary, to Sophie Chotek, in 1900, was morganatic.

The countess was a clever woman, but she never achieved her ambition of being recognized as the future Empress. A daughter of a younger branch of one of the most illustrious noble families of Bohemia, she was left an orphan at an early age and with practically no means or prospects of a dowry to attract suitors. She became a maid of honour to the Archduchess Isabella of Austria, and in that household Francis Ferdinand, then a bachelor of thirty-eight, met her and fell in love. For long his uncle, the Emperor, sternly forbade the marriage, but the representations of Frau Schratz, formerly an obscure actress at a little theatre in Vienna, who had acquired enormous influence over the aged and stubborn ruler, were added to the prayers of Francis Ferdinand and won a reluctant consent. The Emperor, however, insisted that the marriage must be considered as morganatic, the archduke renouncing for his posterity the right of succession to the throne.

That Equal Status.
After the marriage the wise Sophie, instead of asserting herself or seeming to work for that equal status with her husband which was her ambition, adopted the tactics of silence and reserve, effacing herself, remaining absent from Court functions, never in the limelight. She was created Duchess of Hohenberg, but continued to avoid all prominence. Her first triumph was when the Kaiser received her as the consort of the Austrian heir. Eventually even the proud old Emperor, who hated the marriage intensely, went so far as to accord her precedence immediately after the archduchess of the Imperial family. But when the pair were assassinated at Sarajevo the Emperor did not pretend to feel much personal grief. The heir to the throne and his morganatic wife were not allowed a Hapsburg funeral, nor were their remains deposited in the vaults of the Capuchin Church, among the Hapsburg tombs. Only with difficulty was the Emperor persuaded to allow a service to be held over the two coffins in the Augustine Chapel of the Hofburg. Then they were removed at night to one of the Archduke's estates, and hurriedly buried without ceremony. The children of the murdered couple were not allowed to go to Vienna for the service, but only to watch the interment on the estate from a distance.

Amusing Match-Making.

From this sad tragedy one turns with relief to the amusing match-making of Queen Marie of Rumania. She has succeeded in placing two of her daughters on thrones, though one of them, Queen Elizabeth of Greece, has since lost hers. The other, Queen Marie of Yugoslavia, is firmly established and manifestly happy with the very serious, almost melancholy monarch of post-war Greater Serbia. Now, pretty sixteen-year-old Princess Ileana is left to be provided with a royal mate and her mother is credited with placing her hopes very high indeed.

However, if she is disappointed, there remains King Boris of Bulgaria, a handsome as a story-book prince, thirty-one years old, accomplished, and with no vices. A certain lingering romantic glamour surrounds a Balkan throne still, though offset by the daily reports of the French troops with committing excesses at Damascus. After the bombardment had ceased two armoured cars had passed through his mother descending from the proud Bourbons. But Princess Ileana is by no means the only fish in the sea. There are the Princesses Irene, Elizabeth, and Marina of Greece, all charming and of eligible rank, though handicapped by lack of marriage portions. The first is the daughter, the others are the nieces of King Constantine.

The House of Savoy has provided an example of a post-war non-traditional Royal marriage in the union of Princess Yolanda, the elder daughter of the King of Italy, with an Italian nobleman, the Count Calvi di Bergolo. But tradition has only been broken, not abandoned. In Italy, for the second daughter, Mafalda, has recently married Prince Philip, of Hesse, nephew of the ex-Kaiser, and the Prince of Piedmont, heir to the throne, is betrothed to Marie Jose, the only daughter of the King of the Belgians, a matrimonial alliance between reigning houses quite in the traditional manner.

Looting is Charged Against French

LONDON, Oct. 29.—Syrian refugees, the Cairo correspondent of the Daily Mail reports, are charging the French troops with committing excesses at Damascus. After the bombardment had ceased two armoured cars had passed through the principal streets firing at the shops on either side. French officers and soldiers are alleged to have broken into a jeweller's shop and removed the contents, asserting that the proprietor was a Moslem whom they wished to punish.

The house of one of the leading Moslems adjoining the French bank of Syria was blown up with dynamite after the bank's valuables had been safely removed. The refugees report that the bombardment wrecked the jail, killing 1200 prisoners.

Former Saxon King SELLING TAPESTRIES BECAUSE OF POVERTY.

BERLIN, Oct. 26.—(A.P.)—Friedrich August, former King of Saxony, needs money. He has commissioned one of the largest German art dealers to send a representative to the United States to sell five tapestries from Lechewitz Castle, near Dresden. One of these is classified as among the finest specimens of Islamic art, having been taken from the Turks during the siege of Vienna in 1683. The other four are Gobelins of enormous size, made for August the Strong. They depict scenes from the Spanish War of Succession, according to designs by the noted painter Van Der Meulen.
