CHAPTER XIV.

If ever the major was charming, he is tonight. He puts forth all his power of fascination, ransacks his marvelous memory for little anecdotes suitable to drawing-room and ladies' ears, smiles the sweet, angelic smile for which he is justly famous, and—manages to keep Paula by his side the whole evening. He pays her such attention, indeed if he were a younger man, one might be excused in suspecting him of matrimonial motives, and Mr. Palmer, standing against the mantel-shelf and off to the smoking-room to ponder over matrimonial motives, and Mr. Palmer, talking to Bob about the crops, won- the little bargain struck between him
