Many farmers condemn all selling of hay or straw as sure ways to exhaust the farm. But in many places this year they bring much more than their small manurial value, especially for the straw, and they are not proportionably so cheap for feeding as grain or oil meal. To sell some straw and invest the money in richer feed may often be good policy. Every farmer must determine this for him self on the relative values of the feed, and not by mere prejudice in favor of making a large bulk of poor quality manure.
