John Whitgift Is Remembered in Croydon

As Founder of Hospitals

LITTLE while ago, there took place in Croydon, the ancient town some ten miles south of London, an interesting and unusual ceremony, namely, the annual festival service by which commemorated the munificence of Bishop Whitgift to Croydon. It was in fact, the 324th anniversary of the foundation of the Whitgift Hospital, headed by him, the boys of the Whitgift Grammar and Middle Schools marched to the parish church, the Vicar of Croydon presiding, a sermon, for which, under the name of the bequest, he received a building and site, and he took part in the festival very "whitgift" flowers, in other words, the stock and fern. Everything was as it always has been done, and was especially fitting that it should be so. For John Whitgift, sometime Bishop of Canterbury, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, was, in many respects, the most exacting of the school masters, but it shows some of the house which I have lived for the school master, shall be for ever employed to that use only, and to no other. So ran one of his instructions. It has not been strictly obeyed, in the matter of the school house, but it shows to some extent the manner of man he was.

Now, it was on the 17th of January, 1596, that the archbishop, having obtained letters patent from Queen Elizabeth, began to build his hospital "for the relief and sustentation of certain poor people." He finished it on September 29, 1599. Never was there a more methodical and painstaking builder. Not only did he give the most minute instructions as to the work, but the records of each day's progress during the three years spent in building were most carefully and elaborately drawn up. Then, in the matter of regulations, he left nothing unprovided for. Was it a question of a broken window "or other decay by accident or negligence," then the brother or the sister responsible was to "amend it" within one month, on pain of having a week's stoppage out of his allowance. For the hospital was, as it is still, both an almshouse and a school. But, as the way with such foundations, the lands and bequests which provided but a very modest sum, three hundred years ago, have appreciated and appreciated in value until, today the foundation has become a wealthy trust, carrying out the ideas of the founder on a scale which, in all probability, he would have thought possible.

John Whitgift, however, "My white gift," as Queen Elizabeth called him, just as she called Parker, her "black husband," was a man of big ideas. True, the Archbishop of Canterbury was a veritable Prince Bishop, even in the time of Queen Elizabeth, but J. Corbet Anderson has left record, in his "History of Croydon," that Archbishop Whitgift's military surroundings "were somewhat cramped at by his enemies." And indeed such an attitude was altogether without excuse, for the archbishop appears to have made no small stir when he moved officially from place to place. Thus it was his custom to visit Canterbury every third year. On these occasions, he moved from his palace at Croydon with a retinue of 200 persons, and, in addition, "he was honourably escorted by the gentry of the country, so that he sometimes entered the city of Canterbury with a procession of eight hundred to a thousand horse." The archbishop, moreover, had under his own servants, a regular trained force of 140 foot and 50 horse which, in the days of the great Armada, held itself ready, with the redoubtable archbishop at its head, "to take its share in the defence of the realm."

Nevertheless John Whitgift was no swashbuckler, no shallow lover of pomp and circumstance. He was a sturdy bulwark against any lapse from the information, a very different preacher, "as well after his preachers as before," a man of "middle and moderate disposition, of a free mind and a boundless heart towards his household servants, his neighbours, but especially towards scholars and students." True, in spite of his military retinue, he was, as Fuller described him, "far from violence, and his political patience was blessed in a high proportion."

A Scotch Expression.
Very few people who use the expression "Ca' cunn" have any idea what it means, or for the matter of that, how it is pronounced. A writer in "Ways and Means" has given us the nearest approach to the sound of the Scottish "ca' cunn" which stands for call—in this instance having nothing to do with calling a halt, but referring to action, not speech, such for instance as turning a skipping rope or working a pump handle. Thus, if we take pumping as an illustration, the phrase "Ca' cunn" would mean to work cautiously, not to pump so vigorously that the water is stopped over and wanted; the man pumping is asked not to squander his time by doing his job badly. It is noted as a curious fact that curious phrase embodying nothing but good sound ideas should have been retained on the south side of the border to use based on an economic fallacy.

A Blind Gaffer.
An English Victoria Cross officer, who was blinded in the war, still plays golf. He goes on the course accompanied by his wife, and his ball is teed for him by a caddy. His wife assists him to get his feet into exactly the right position. The caddy then rings a tiny bell to which he must aim. On the green he relies also upon touch.

HAD RHEUMATISM FOR FIVE YEARS

No Return of the Trouble Since Taking "FRUIT-A-TIVES"

MR. JOHN E. GUILDERSON
P. O. Box 123, Parrish, N. S.
"I suffered with Rheumatism for five years, having it so badly at times I was unable to get up without assistance. I tried different medicines I saw advertised and was treated by doctors in Amherst, also in my home town, but the Rheumatism came back. In 1913, I saw in an advertisement that 'Fruit-a-tives' would stop Rheumatism, and took one box and got relief; then I took them right along for about six months and the Rheumatism was all gone and I have never felt it since."

Anyone who would care to write me as regards 'Fruit-a-tives' I would be glad to tell them what 'Fruit-a-tives' did for me.

One Continent Is Lost

EVIDENCE is coming to light recently that if Columbus had set forth on his great voyage a few thousands or hundreds of thousands of years earlier he would have found three instead of two continents of America. That is to say, the world is shy at least one continent which has hitherto been lost. What seems to be established is that the present island of Japan was not always a part of the continent of Asia, but was a separate island, the centre of a far-sized continent. The only alternative theory is that the larger West Indian Islands were once part of Central America.

It is not too much to assume that many readers at present are unaware that between an island and a continent there is a greater difference than in mere size. Islands are of quite different formation, for the most part. Excepting those situated along what may be called the shelf of the continents, and were once part of the mainland, islands are of volcanic origin. They come to exist as a result of coral growth or some volcanic disturbance. They are either built up by insects or are thrown up by some tremendous convulsion of the earth. Continents do not thus come into being. Continents are of the older lineage. Islands are more numerous. This is proved by the animal life found on continents and islands. Oceanic islands have rarely any large mammals. Their animal life consists largely, if not wholly, of winged insects that found it possible to cross large expanses of salt water from the continents to the islands. They have also those lower forms of life the eggs of which happen to have been carried by hurricanes, water, or other natural agencies.

The discovery with regard to the lost continent of Antilla was made by H. E. K. Mearns, who headed an expedition sent out by the American Museum of Natural History, and who spent several months in the Indies. The object of the search was fossils, and the seekers were richly rewarded. They found fossil remains of many mammals now extinct, some of them being of varieties not elsewhere encountered. They were found in Pleistocene formations and date back probably one hundred thousand years. Most of the fossils were found in limestone caves, imbedded in a hard limestone block, and were not out after many hours hard work. Most of the specimens were brought back in the limestone blocks, and it is said that an immense amount of labor will be necessary before the specimens are properly identified and classified. One of the curiosities was a monster rodent, much larger than any now in existence. There is also a great collection of bats, reptiles and birds, interesting to naturalists, but not giving evidence that the West Indies were once a continent or part of it.

At the present time, the only wild mammals in Jamaica are the coney and the mongoose. The coney was imported many years ago and flourished. Unfortunately rats flourished on the sea. The expedition also did some checking up on Herbert Spencer's theory, that in tertiary times the present bottom of the sea was from a pile and a half to two miles higher than it is now from its present conformation. "If this be so," says Capt. Anthony, as quoted in the Boston Transcript, by J. Olin Howe, "it gives us our continent there which our forefathers seem to indicate. The ridges of the sea bottom seem to follow the general direction of the mountain ranges we find on the larger islands, and Spence concluded that the ridges now under water and the mountain ranges which rear themselves above it were formerly all parts of the same system." He believes that the mountains of the lost continent were higher than any now on the American continent, but does not say that the high roads may have become eroded by this erosion, and have thus been incited to abolish a continent.
