THUS education has a sweep far beyond the school proper, beyond even the college and the university. There is the school of life, the university of civilization, of which all men and women in one way or other must be members, and in which they must be disciplined through education. Art, science, literature, history, philosophy are branches of this vast educative institution, and their highest object is not to give pleasure merely, not to impart information simply, but is to recreate and to make alive and active in all minds the whole institutional world, of which everybody is a member and of which everybody ought to be a living incarnation."—From Social Institutions, by Denton J. Snyder.
