306 An ACCOUNT of the EUROPEAN

not bear them; and to raife fudden and heavy taxes, would deftroy the province without anfwering their purpofe. Credit then came in aid of money, and the government iffued bills to the amount of what they wanted, to pals current in all payments; and they commonly laid a tax, or found fome perfons willing to engage their lands as fecurity, for gradually finking this debt, and calling in these bills. But before the time arrived at which these taxes were to answer their end, new exigencies made new emifiions of paper currency neceffary; and thus things went from debt to debt, until it became very visible that no taxes which could be impofed could difcharge them; and that the land fecurities given were often fraudulent, and almost always infufficient. Then the paper currency became no longer to be weighed against the credit of the government, which depended upon its vifible revenue. It was compared to the trade, to which it was found to difproportionate, that the bills fell ten, twenty, fifty, and eighty per cent in fome places. It was to no purpose that the government used every method to keep up their credit, and even to compelt he receiving of these bills at the value for which they were emitted, and to give no preference over them to gold and filver; they were more and more depreciated every day; whilft the government every day emitted more paper, and grew
