Woman's Love.

"He loves you so dearly," she replied. "Besides, in a few years, all this will be forgotten, and you will be Phebe Blandford, not Phebe Lincoln." "But if he is arrested, he will be prosecuted and sent to jail," I interposed, resolving not at present to say anything of the discovery that I was not Christopher Lincoln's daughter." "Probably you would be in India, if that happened," she went on. "Oh, I see how we could all be happy again! Come, dearest Phebe, do not sacrifice us all to your overtrained scruples. You were always self-willed, and had your own way too much. I know no other girl who would set herself against her natural friends as you are doing. I should never advise you to go back to your father, but I do advise you most emphatically not to be so rash and hot-headed as to fling away your only chance of marrying Arthur.' She paused, and we sat silent for some time. "Let us look at the question all round," she resumed, gravely and affectionately. "If you give up this provision which your father has so thoughtfully secured for you, you will doom yourself to the meanest penury, with only the meager satisfaction of having given less than a penny in the pound to your father's creditors, not one of whom will ever thank you for it. world will call you a fool. You will live your whole life in poverty and dependence; an unmarried woman, unless you marry a man far beneath you. A life of contempt and misery will end in an unknown and a neglected grave." She paused again, as if overcome by her own eloquence, but every word was hardening my heart against her. "If you listen to me," she resumed, "you will marry the man you love, with whom your days will pass by in unbroken happiness. You will lead a life as useful and honorable as mine, doing good to all around you. Think of that! If it is a question of honor, Phebe, remember the divine command, 'Honor thy father and thy mother.' How can you keep that f you act in distinct opposition to your father and me?"

I would not tell her now that neither of them had any claim upon my esteem and obedience by force of that commandment. She had completely shocked my sense of right and wrong. I was silenced, but not convinced. But I roused myself with a heavy sigh, and stood up to go away. dress?" 'I inquired.

she said, "and I also "Certainly," will write to him." She kissed me, but she did not ask me where I was staying. I was in disgrace with Arthur's mother, or she wished me to come soon to the bitter end. I went downstairs and into the streets of London in deep dejection of spirit, and with a depressing sense of forlorneness in the midst of crowds.

CHAPTER VIII.

It was necessary to make some arrangement for the immediate future, as today was Saturday, and on Monday Rebecca was to give up the house at Wimbledon to the carpenters and decorators. I could think of no friend to turn to but my old governess, Miss'A Bricot. She had been living in some cheap lodgings in Shepherds Bush, where I had often visited her; and no doubt if she had left them her landlady could tell me where she had gone. I found Abby located in a tiny back bedroom under the roof, instead of the small sitting-room in the front, and a room behind it, which she had for-merly occupied. It was scarcely possible to get into this attic, and not possible to move about in it. Abby received me with the utmost tenderness. "My own love! I was dreaming of you last night," she said tearfully. "Our spirits were in sweet communion somewhere, and I was most happy. No, I

"But I suppose our spirits could have met if my body had still been in America," I remarked almost gaily. "To be sure," she answered; "but I would rather have you in the body, I knelt down beside her, and, with my arms about her, I told her how

"and you and I will fight the battle of life together. Oh, I'm used to the bat-All my money is expended, except a few shillings, and I must quit this poor refuge next week. But you shall share it with me as long as it shelters my old head." "Is it as bad as that, Abby?" I asked. "Are you, too, without friends?"

"Oh, no," she answered, with an odd quaver in her voice. "There's Mr. Palmer—you recollect him, dear love? He who said so kindly, 'We three are all bound together in a fellowship of suffering, and if we can help one another it is our bounden duty to do so.'
You know he and I started you off at

"I have not forgotten him," I said. "He has never lost sight of me," she continued, "though he lives at one end of London, and me at the other. His son, dear Felix, comes at least once a week to see me, and they are both so good! And my love, they are urging me to take up my abode with them. They say there are two empty rooms in their house, and I could help them in many ways, far more than my maintenance would cost. They have had no lady to live in the house ever since Mr. Palmer went to live in Churchwarden street, and they would be most pleased I wondered if Miss 'A Bricot's pride of birth made her hesitate to accept this kindly proposal. There was a pink flush on her faded face, and a curious self-consciousness in her half-smile. "My dear," she resumed, "it was a most tempting invitation, but I did not consider it quite convenable for an unmarried woman like myself, not altogether beyond a marriageable age, to reside alone in the house of two unmarried men. My sense of delicacy and propriety was opposed to it. I believe Mr. Palmer, who is delicacy itself, guessed at my objections, for he gave me a hint-only a hint, Phebethat to remove them he would offer me

"Offer you what?" I exclaimed. This was Quixotic in very deed. "It was most gently, most delicately intimated," answered Abby. there would be no such objection if we both go, I think. I am thankful, dear Mr. Palmer was not more explicit, for I must either have refused or accepted him, and it would have been so embarrassing. Now it is quite simple; we go as lodgers, and we shall surely find some way of earning our living. Yes, two are better than one, and you will go with me to Churchwarden street next week." "We will go for a time," I said, "till we can get something to do. I, too, must earn my bread.' Then I poured out the strange story of my travels to Abby, who listened with breathless interest, scarcely interrupting me with a remark until I came to my stepfather's revelation that was not his child.

"Ah! that explains so much, my love," she exclaimed. "He never did care for you as a father naturally would. I set it down to Mrs. Lincoln's jealous influence. He was quite indifferent to you until people began to tell him you would be beautiful. Then he was proud enough, and anxious to show you off, and make you an attraction to his house. Oh! now I understand it tightly in her hand. perfectly. That was why he dismissed dressed, and had evidently been dead me and sent you to Inglefield College,

"I did not like either," I remarked. "No, thank goodness," she said. "I do not suppose any young lady I had trained could like either. But what else did you learn?"
"I learned to dress, dance and ride

well," I replied. "I learned, too, how illbred it is to speak the truth always, "Will you give me Arthur's ad- and how polite little fibs are. But above all, I learned that woman is superior to man; but that the elder girls taught me, not the governesses. On the contrary, they gave us to understand that marriage with a good settlement is the aim and end of every Woman's life."

"Woman superior to man!" repeated Abby, bridling and blushing. "Wait, dear child, till you know the Palmers." "Was my mother a superior woman? Did you know anything of her?" I

"I came to take charge of you on Mr. Lincoln's second marriage," she answered, "and I never heard her mentioned. You were very little, and there was a foreign nurse, who sent away the day after I entered on my duties, Rebecca staying as schoolroom maid. I only saw her once, but you cried a great deal after Benny, as you called her. My love, if we could only find her we should learn every-

But where to begin to look for her? The clue was short and slight. A childish memory of an impossible name --for "Benny" told us nothing of her nationality. I sat musing over this very insurmountable barrier for a few

"I do not know where I can go except with you to Mr. Palmer's," I said. "He seemed a very kindly, very friendly old But we are not altogether penniless, and we must pay for our lodgings. I have nearly nine pounds in my purse-quite a fortune!" I added, with a bitter little laugh, as I recol-

Woman's power is largely dependent upon her ability to interest, entertain, attract and please. It is for this reason that women strive to become accomplished. They study in order that they may converse intelligently on all subjects. They strive to become good musicians, graceful dancers and amiable hostesses. All accomplishments are unavailing if a woman suffers from ill-health in a womanly way. The special weakness peculiar to the womanly organism, will rapidly wreck the general health. The sufferer will lose her natural vivacity, her wit, her good looks, and the ambition and power to display the accomplishments at her command. Any woman affected in this way should resort woman affected in this way should resort to Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. It is a wonderful medicine for ailing women. I looked round the crowded little attic. There was a small Chippendale table with a crack across it, a moth-eaten easy chair, a two-branched brass candlestick, a few china ornaments, and a station that day of the dreadful large colored photograph of myself at 16, which was a wholesome corrective of personal vanity. Besides these valuable possessions there were three large trunks, containing all the rest of Abby's worldly goods. However, she was far better off than I was, for I owned nothing save the contents of a small traveling portmanteau, which I had rescued from my stepmother when she carried away all the rest of my be-longings to South America.

Despondent Chambermaid's Rash Act Results in Death.

Suicides at Niagara Falls, Euffalo and Arnprior.

Niagara Falls, N. Y., March 4.—For reasons unkown, Mae McFadden, a chambermaid at the Harvey House, took a heavy dose of carbolic acid on Wednesday afternoon, and died from the effects at 9 o'clock at night. Miss McFadden was born in Toronto, Ont., and until a few years ago her parents were fairly weil-to-do. Then for-tune left them, and the children were compelled to look out for themselves. Mae McFadden came to this city and secured a position as chambermaid at the Harvey House. She could not reconcile herself to her new life, and grew despondent. Wednesday afternoon she left the hotel, and stated in a significant manner that she was going down street to get something good. She purchased an ounce of carbolic acid, went to her room and drank the entire lot. The deceased was 22 years old. She came to this city a year ago from the Continental Hotel in Buffalo. She was extremely pretty and well
