Mr. Justice Crampton, if there is a necessity for it, undoubtedly it must be done. What do you say, Mr. Moore?

Mr. Moore, I say nothing, my lord. (Laughter.) Mr. Justice Crampton, then you won't commit yourself, at any rate. (Laughter.)

Mr. Justice Crampton, I have not my note-book here now, but I shall take care to remember the objection—indeed, I don't think we shall ever hear of it again.

The Jury having been sent for, Mr. Floyd entered, and said—My Lord, has the Jury been sent for?

Mr. Justice Crampton, I want the Jury a third time. (Laughter.) Mr. Floyd, when we came before we found we were not wanted. (A laugh.)

Mr. Justice Crampton, but now you are wanted. (Laughter.) The Jury having appeared, Mr. Justice Crampton addressed them as follows:

Gentlemen, I have a very unpleasant communication to make to you. I am informed that the Sheriff has been notified—indeed, it is not out of my jurisdiction to receive your verdict. I am very much distressed, indeed, at the necessity of arranging out of the Court. Sunday morning has commenced, and you will return to your room, and every possible accommodation will be afforded you.
