She was a lovely little thing not more than two years old, with dark blue eyes and tumbled curls of palest gold. Her iress and hooded cape were of richly embroidered white cashmere, and her underin tiny pearls, on one side. Inside, was a portrait of herself. There was no luggage except a hand bag, with a change of under. Clothing for the child, and a purse, with a change to the store of the s

Next morning Aline, pleading a headsche, kept to her room until noon. Then she went down to find Mrs. Stephons on the orying for "Mannie," refusing to be com-forted, but the moment she saw Miss Merideth, she reached out her arms and lisped: "Wants to do home. Oo tate Allie." "That 1 will, precious. Come with aun-

Just then, the cry of "A man drowning," was heard. All was confusion; no one going to the rescue of the man until Harold, tossing his reins to his father, flew down the steps, throwing off his coat and kicking off his shoes, as he went, and plunged into the w.vcs. He was strong, fearless and a fine swimmer; the man, cool and selt posbroldered white consister, and its a chain slothing daintily fine. Attached to a chain sessed, though so nearly lost, did not cing about her neck, was a locket with "Aline," to his resource, impeding his efforts, as pine in tiny pearls, on one side. Inside, was a out of ten would have done, and they were clothing for the child, and a purse, with a small sum of money in it; nothing to show whence they had come or who they were, and, in spite of every effort, nothing more and, in spite of every effort, nothing more debted. Harold told him his pame, and was learned, so the woman found a resting place in the quiet old churchyard and the child a home with the Misses Merideth. The Misses Mary and Nannie Meideth had lived all their lives in Baywille a sured. Getting quickly into dry clothes, he tapped at his mother's door and asked atter Aline. She was lying down and he advised his mother to do the same, kis.i. g her, as she clung to him, unperved as he had seldom seen his calm, self poised mother Soun after dinner, a fine looking middle aged gentleman was shown into the Stephens' parlor. He introduced himself as Mr. William Marston of New York, and said he wished again to thank Mr. Stephens for saving Lis life. Judge Stephens knew Mr. Marston well, by reputation, as a gentleman of scholarly attainments, writer, philanthropist, one whom all men delighted to honor, and was pleased, indeed, to present him to his wife and guest. When Aline extended her hand and raised her eyes to his Mr. Marston turned pale and stared at her, for a moment, unable to speak. "Who is this young lady?" he demanded at last, in agitated tones. Then, controll ing himself with an effort, "I beg that you will pardon me. I did not catch the name. and the likeness to my dear dead wife is so great that I know not what to think." Aline looked appealingly at the judge who briefly told the story of the accident and the adoption of Aline by the Misses Merideth. "Were there no trinkets? Nothing kept that they wore?" "Yes," said Aline, "here is a chain and ocket which was about my neck; I have always worn them," placing them in his hand. "My baby's locket and portrait," he breathed. "Thank God, for this meeting, I am positive that you are my daughter, taken away by her nurse, during my absence in Europe, with my wife who had been ordered ab oad by our physician. She had been very ill and it was deemed best that the child should be left at home. We had every confidence in the nurse. Marianne Dapont, who had been with Aline since her birth. A few days after our departure she told the housekeeper that she had been ordered, by the master, to take the child to some quiet country place. When they were settled, she would write him where they were. It was weeks before I learned of their absence. We had been moving from place to place and, alarmed as I was, about my wife, I had not worried because letters had not followed us. When I heard that my child had been taken from home, my wife was so ill'that I dared not tell her the truth. I wrote my lawyer to institute a search for Aline, but he was away and my letter not forwarded so nothing was done. My dear wife died without knowing that her baby was missing. I brought her precious body how e and began a search for my child. Not a trace could be found. But, in Heaven's name, did no one try to learn where this child came from?'
