

The national president, the nine vice-presidents and the national council of fifty-four was to be the governing body for the Dominion. This body could, when necessary, appoint an executive committee, or sub-committees from among its members to deal with special matters either of a temporary or a permanent character. The national organization was to meet at Ottawa at least once a year during the session of parliament. If more frequent meetings were necessary they could be called by the leader.

Under this arrangement it was asserted that neither the head office nor either of its branches would in the slightest degree supplant or in any way interfere with the organization work of any province, or of any parts of any province. The provincial method with its own arrangements worked out in its own way must prevail. The head office was to be in touch with the work of every provincial association. The organization branch of the head office was to see that party efficiency was constantly maintained through each of the provincial organizations. This would necessitate co-operation of the most sympathetic and continuous character resulting in both party and national unity. The work of the information branch was to be similar to that of the Liberal information branch of the head office at Ottawa. It was urged that
